ELEMENTS OF CRIMES

Did the defendant negligently cause the death of the two-year-old victim?

The defendant did not allow the two-year-old victim to consume liquids after 8 p.m. in order to prevent him from wetting the bed. The defendant also prevented the victim from consuming liquids at other times in order to encourage him to consume solid food. . . . [T]he defendant gave the victim little or nothing to drink from the morning of February 22, 2009, to the morning of February 26, 2009.

Moreover, at some point during the victim's stay, the defendant attempted to discourage him from drinking out of cups belonging to other people. In order to accomplish this, the defendant placed a small amount of hot sauce in a cup and left it on the kitchen table. The victim consumed hot sauce from a cup on at least one occasion.

In the days immediately preceding his death, the victim began to exhibit numerous symptoms of dehydration. He had dry, cracked lips, a sunken face and a diminished appetite. He also had lost a significant amount of weight. On the morning of February 26, 2009, the defendant discovered that the victim was not breathing. Shortly thereafter, the defendant contacted emergency personnel by telephone. . . . The deputy chief medical examiner later confirmed that the child had died due to insufficient fluid intake. . . . The defendant possesses an IQ of 61. This score places her within the bottom one half of 1 percent of the population. (State v. Patterson, 27 A.3D 374 [Conn. App. 2011])

INTRODUCTION

A crime comprises an actus reus, or a criminal act or omission (failure to act), and a mens rea, or a criminal intent. Conviction of a criminal charge requires evidence establishing beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused possessed the required mental state and performed a voluntary act that caused the social harm condemned in the statute. Shortly, I will explain how an omission or failure to act may constitute a crime. At the moment, our focus is on criminal acts.

There must be a concurrence between the actus reus and mens rea. For instance, common law burglary is the breaking and entering of the dwelling house of another at night with the intent to commit a felony. A backpacker may force his or her way into a cabin to escape the sweltering summer heat and, once having entered, find it impossible to resist the temptation to steal hiking equipment. The requisite intent to steal developed following the breaking and entering, and our backpacker is not guilty of common law burglary. The requirement of concurrence is illustrated by the California Penal Code, which provides that “in every crime . . . there must exist a union or joint operation of act and intent.”¹

Actus reus generally involves three elements or components: (1) a voluntary act or failure to perform an act (2) that causes (3) a social harm condemned under a criminal statute. Homicide, for instance, may involve the voluntary shooting or stabbing (act) of another human being that results in (causation) death (social harm). The Indiana Criminal Code, in part, provides that a “person commits an offense only if he voluntarily engages in conduct in violation of the statute defining the offense.”²

Keep in mind that certain offenses are strict liability offenses. An individual is held liable for a strict liability offense who is proven beyond a reasonable doubt to have committed a criminal act. There is no requirement of a criminal intent.

There are various other requirements to prove a criminal act in addition to an act and to an intent. First, keep in mind that an act may be innocent or criminal depending on the context or attendant circumstances. Entering an automobile, turning the key, and driving down the highway may be innocent or criminal depending on whether the driver is the owner or a thief. Second, crimes require differing attendant circumstances. An assault on a police officer requires an attack on a law enforcement official; an assault with a dangerous weapon involves the employment of an instrument capable of inflicting serious injury, such as a knife or firearm. A third point is that some offenses require that an act cause a specific harm. Homicide, for instance, involves an act that directly causes the death of the victim, while false pretenses require that an individual obtain title to property through the false representation of a fact or facts. In the case of these so-called result crimes, the defendant’s act must be the “actual cause” of the resulting harm. An individual who dangerously assaults a victim who subsequently dies may not be guilty of homicide in the event that the victim would have lived and her death was caused by the gross negligence of an ambulance driver.

In this chapter, we discuss the concepts that constitute the foundation of a criminal offense:

Acts

Intent

Concurrence

Causality

CRIMINAL ACTS AND THOUGHTS

What is an act? It is sufficient to note that the popular view is that an act involves a bodily movement, whether voluntary or involuntary.

The significant point is that the criminal law punishes voluntary acts and does not penalize thoughts. Why?

- Punishing people for their thoughts would involve an unacceptable degree of governmental intrusion into individual privacy.
- It would be difficult to distinguish between criminal thoughts that reflect momentary anger, frustration, or fantasy, and thoughts involving the serious consideration of criminal conduct.
- Individuals should be punished only for conduct that creates a social harm or imminent threat of social harm and should not be penalized for thoughts that are not translated into action.
- The social harm created by an act can be measured and a proportionate punishment imposed. The harm resulting from thoughts is much more difficult to determine.

How should we balance the interest in freedom of thought and imagination against the social interest in the early detection and prevention of social harm in the case of an individual who records dreams of child molestation in his or her private diary?

A VOLUNTARY CRIMINAL ACT

A more problematic issue is the requirement that a crime consist of a voluntary act. The Indiana Criminal Law Study Commission, which assisted in writing the Indiana statute on criminal conduct, explains that voluntary simply means a conscious choice by an individual to commit or not to commit an act.³ Professor Joshua Dressler compares an involuntary movement to the branch of a tree that is blown by the wind into a passerby. A voluntary act may involve pulling the trigger of a gun, hitting a victim, moving your mouth and inciting a riot, or offering another person money to commit a murder.⁴

The requirement of a voluntary act is based on the belief that it would be fundamentally unfair to punish individuals who do not consciously choose to engage in criminal activity and who therefore cannot be considered morally blameworthy. There also is the practical consideration that there is no need to deter, incapacitate, or rehabilitate individuals who involuntarily engage in criminal conduct.⁵

Once again, a voluntary act “requires an ability to choose which course to take—i.e., an ability to choose whether to commit the act that gives rise to criminal liability.”⁶ Consider several cases in Table 3.1 in which courts were required to determine whether to hold defendants criminally liable who claimed that they should be acquitted because they had committed an involuntary act.

An individual driving an automobile is not held liable for an unanticipated stroke or heart attack that involuntarily causes an accident and the death of another. Courts reason that the death resulted from an unanticipated, involuntary act. However, these types of situations can be complicated. Consider the frequently cited case of People v. Decina, in which the defendant was convicted of negligent homicide. The defendant’s automobile jumped a curb and killed four children. The appellate court affirmed Decina’s conviction despite the fact that the accident resulted from an

Sample of Court Decisions on Involuntary Acts

Involuntary Act	Court Decision
Sleepwalking	The Kentucky Supreme Court ruled that a defendant, who claimed that he was a “sleepwalker,” should not be convicted in the event that he was “unconscious when he killed the deceased.” See Fain v. Commonwealth , 78 Ky. 183 (1879).
Reflex Action	A California court of appeals concluded that the evidence supported the “inference” that a defendant who had been wounded in the abdomen had shot and killed a police officer as a reflex action and was in a “state of unconsciousness.” See People v. Newton , 87 Cal. Rptr. 394 (Cal. App. 1970).
Drugs in Jail	Eaton was arrested for driving with his headlights turned off and failed a field sobriety test. He was arrested for DUI and taken to the county jail where he was searched, the officers seized methamphetamine, and he was charged with possession of a controlled substance. The prosecutor sought a sentence enhancement because Eaton introduced the narcotics into the county jail. The Washington Supreme Court held that Eaton was “forcibly taken” to the county jail and that a sentence enhancement could not be lawfully imposed. See State v. Eaton , 229 P3d 704 (Wash. 2010). An Arizona appellate court based on similar facts held that the defendant’s possession of a controlled substance was “voluntary in that, after being advised of the consequences of bringing drugs into the jail, [he] consciously chose to ignore the officers’ warnings, choosing instead to enter the jail in possession of cocaine. Under these circumstances, the [defendant] was the author of his own fate.” See State v. Alvarado , 200 P3d 1037 (Ariz. App. 2008).

epileptic seizure. The judges reasoned that the statute “does not necessarily contemplate that the driver be conscious at the time of the accident” and that it is sufficient that the defendant “knew of his medical disability and knew that it would interfere with the operation of a motor vehicle.” In other words, Decina committed a voluntary act when he voluntarily got behind the wheel of his auto, consciously turned the key, and drove the auto, although he was aware that he might experience a seizure.⁷

The notion that an act may be involuntary is not an easy concept to comprehend, and you may be justifiably skeptical about whether this is humanly possible. In a famous Canadian case in 1988, twenty-four-year-old Kenneth Parks was acquitted of murder after he was found to have driven fourteen miles to his mother-in-law’s home and beat her to death with a tire iron. Parks successfully argued that he was sleepwalking, and friends testified that he had a history of sleepwalking. Expert medical witnesses testified that there were roughly thirty cases in which a “sleepwalker” committed murder.⁸

Model Penal Code (MPC) Section 2.01 provides a good summary of the requirement that a criminal act must include “a voluntary act or the omission to perform an act.” The MPC avoids the difficulties involved in trying to unravel the differences between voluntary and involuntary acts by listing categories of involuntary acts.

MPC Section 2.01 defines the Requirement of Voluntary Act as follows (reprinted in partial):

Model Penal Code

Section 2.01. Requirement of Voluntary Act

- (1) A person is not guilty of an offense unless his liability is based on conduct that includes a voluntary act or the omission to perform an act of which he is physically capable.
- (2) The following are not voluntary acts within the meaning of this Section:
 - (a) a reflex or convulsion;
 - (b) a bodily movement during unconsciousness or sleep;
 - (c) conduct during hypnosis or resulting from hypnotic suggestion;
 - (d) a bodily movement that otherwise is not a product of the effort or determination of the actor, either conscious or habitual.

The Legal Equation

Actus reus = A voluntary act or failure to perform an act.

Voluntary act = A bodily movement that is the product of a conscious choice.

3.1 Thomas F. Martino and his wife, Carmen Keenon, got into an argument. Martino shoved his wife down the front stairs of the home. He fell on Keenon and began choking her. The police arrived and observed Martino on top of Keenon on the stair landing outside of the couple’s apartment. The officers ordered Martino to get off of Keenon who replied in a combative tone, “[Y]ou ain’t going to ----ing do anything.” After the police repeated these orders several more times, threatened to tase Martino, and began moving up the stairs, Martino stood up, moved to the front of the landing, and “squared off” against the police in a way that indicated that he wanted to fight.” Martino yelled at the police, “Come on.” One of the officers tased Martino, who dropped to the ground, having lost control of his muscles because of being tased. He fell backward on top of Keenon, breaking her arm. The trial court found Martino guilty of aggravated domestic battery, aggravated battery, unlawful restraint, and two counts of resisting or obstructing a police officer. The defendant was sentenced to concurrent terms totaling 180 days in jail and four years of probation. Martino claims that his breaking of Keenon's arm was an involuntary act and that he may not be held criminally liable for a battery. Do you agree? See People v. Martino, 970 N.E.2d 1236 (Ill. App. 2012).

CRIMINAL LAW IN THE NEWS

Gilberto Valle, age thirty-one, the so-called “Cannibal Cop,” was convicted of conspiracy to kidnap. A New York police officer, Valle was convicted in March 2013 based on his alleged secret plotting on “dark” Internet sites to abduct several women, including his own wife. He used online identities like Girlmeat Hunter and searched for methods of kidnapping, subduing, torturing, and killing women and used a law enforcement database to collect information about his victims. Valle also conducted Internet searches on topics such as “how to chloroform a girl.”

Valle's wife discovered his postings about women on fetish chat rooms. In one e-mail, Valle described hanging a victim by her feet and “cutting her throat” and “[l]etting her bleed . . . [and] butcher[ing] her while she hangs.” Other messages stated that “part of me wants to put her in the oven while she is still alive, but at a very low heat,” and expressed a desire to “make some bacon strips off her belly.”

Federal District Court Judge Paul G. Gardephe overturned Valle's conspiracy conviction, finding that he only engaged in “fantasy role-play.” “No one was ever kidnapped, no attempted kidnapping [occurred] . . . and no real-world, non-Internet-based steps were ever taken to kidnap anyone.” Judge Gardephe acknowledged that Valle's “depraved, misogynistic sexual fantasies about his wife, former college classmates and acquaintances undoubtedly reflected a mind diseased.” However, Valle never met and did not know the men with whom he communicated and took no “non-Internet-based steps” to implement the plan. The dates for the kidnappings passed without comment or discussion or implementation.

Valle did receive a one-year sentence for using a law enforcement database to learn about the women about whom he fantasized and was required to continue mental health treatment. At the time of his sentencing, Valle had already been jailed for twenty months while awaiting trial.

In December 2015, the Second Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed Judge Gardephe's reversal of Valle's conviction. Judge Barrington D. Parker Jr. wrote that “fantasizing about committing a crime, even a crime of violence against a real person whom you know, is not a crime.” Judge Parker cautioned that Valle's rhetoric was not harmless because it is both a “symptom of and a contributor to a culture of . . . massive social harm that demeans women.” Valle in an interview following the reversal of his conviction recognized that the anonymity of the computer screen contributes to a culture in which “you try . . . [to] outdo the other person [as to] who can be the sicker one.” Why did the appellate courts consider Valle to have engaged in fantasy? Do you agree with the decision to acquit Valle?

STATUS

An individual may not be held criminally liable for a status. A status is defined as a “characteristic” or a “condition” or “state of being.” The rule is that you may not be criminally punished for “who you are”; you may be held liable only for “what you do.” In other words, we cannot be held criminally responsible based on our race, religion, gender, or sexual preference or the fact that we have a disease or are a former offender. In 1969, in Wheeler v. Goodman, a federal district court judge held that the defendants had been improperly arrested and punished because they were unemployed “hippies.”⁹

A man is free to be a hippie, a Methodist, a Jew, a Black Panther, a Kiwanian, or even a Communist, so long as his conduct does not imperil others, or infringe upon their rights. In short, it is no crime to be a hippie. . . . Status—even that of a gambler or prostitute—may not be made criminal. The acts of gambling, prostitution, and operating bawdy houses are criminally punishable, of course, but the state cannot create the special status of vagrant for persons who commit those illegal acts and then punish the status instead of the act.

What about the status of being a drug addict? In Robinson v. California, the U.S. Supreme Court was asked to determine whether Robinson could be held criminally liable for his status of being “addicted to narcotics.” The Court found the California law unconstitutional because it did not “require possession or use of narcotics, or disorderly behavior resulting from narcotics, but rather imposed liability for the mere status of being addicted.” The justices concluded that just as it would be cruel to make it a crime to be mentally ill or a leper or to be afflicted with venereal disease, it was cruel to convict an individual for the “disease of addiction” without requiring proof of narcotics possession or antisocial behavior.¹⁰

Six years later, the Court reached a different outcome in Powell v. Texas. Leroy Powell was an alcoholic with roughly one hundred arrests for public intoxication. He was arrested for “being found in a state of intoxication in a public place.” Powell claimed that he could not control his urge to drink and that because of his status as an alcoholic, he should not be held guilty for being drunk in public. The Supreme Court rejected Powell’s argument that he was being punished for being a chronic alcoholic and held that he was being punished for public behavior that posed “substantial health and safety hazards, both to himself and for members of the general public.”¹¹

Powell, according to the majority of the justices, was not suffering from a disease that made him unable to control his desire to drink. Each morning, Powell made a voluntary decision to start drinking and knew that by the end of the day, he would find himself drunk in public and subject to arrest.

In other words, although Robinson was improperly punished for being a “narcotics addict,” Powell was properly punished for being “drunk and disorderly in public.” Consider how the Court would have ruled if the scientific evidence indicated that alcoholics like Powell have a gene that makes them unable to resist drinking and getting drunk in public. Would Powell, on these facts, succeed in claiming that he was being punished for a status rather than for an act?

You might be thinking about the fact that sex offenders are prohibited from living nearby a school or church; suspected terrorists are prohibited from flying on commercial airliners; and, in many states, undocumented young people are denied state college tuition. Are these status offenses? The answer is that these disabilities are civil regulations designed to protect the public rather than “criminal punishments” imposed on individuals. A homeless individual who is convicted of sleeping in the park is being punished for his or her act rather than his or her status. On the other hand, some argue that a homeless individual is compelled by his or her homelessness and the lack of housing to sleep in the park.

3.2 An FBI search of Bruce Black’s home and home computer resulted in the seizure of photographs and computer diskettes containing unlawful child pornography. Black pled guilty to the receipt, possession, and distribution of child pornography that had been transmitted in interstate commerce. He was sentenced to eighteen months in prison and to three years of supervised release. The government stipulated in the plea agreement that Black was a “pedophile and/or ephebophile [sexually attracted to young men]” and that “the receipt, collection and distribution of child pornography was a pathological symptom of the defendant’s pedophilia and/or ephebophilia.” Psychiatric reports concluded that despite Black’s illness, Black was able to appreciate the wrongfulness of his acts and was able to control his impulses and limit his involvement in child pornography to those periods in which his roommate was absent. Black appealed and claimed that he was unable to control his sexual urges and that he was being punished for his status as a pedophile and/or ephebophile. Do you agree with Black? Will his appeal be successful? See United States v. Black, 116 F.3d 198 (7th Cir. 1997).

OMISSIONS

Can you be held criminally liable for a failure to act? For casually stepping over the body of a dying person who is blocking the entrance to your favorite coffee shop? The MPC requires that criminal conduct be based on a “voluntary act or omission to perform an act of which [an individual] is physically capable.” An omission is a failure to act or a “negative act.”

The American and European Bystander Rules

The basic rule in the United States is that an individual is not legally required to assist a person who is in peril. This principle was clearly established in 1907 in People v. Beardsley. The Michigan Supreme Court ruled that the married Beardsley was not liable for failing to take steps to ensure the safety of Blanche Burns, a woman with whom he was spending the weekend. The court explained that the fact that Burns was in Beardsley’s house at the time she overdosed on drugs and alcohol did not create a legal duty to assist her. The Michigan judges cited in support of this verdict the statement of U.S. Supreme Court Justice Stephen Johnson Field that it is “undoubtedly the moral duty of every person to extend to others assistance when in danger . . . and, if such efforts should be omitted . . . he would by his conduct draw upon himself the just censure and reproach of good men; but this is the only punishment to which he would be subjected by society.”¹² Chief Justice Alonzo Philetus Carpenter of the New Hampshire Supreme Court earlier had recognized that an individual did not possess a duty to rescue a child standing in the path of an oncoming train. Justice Carpenter noted that “if he does not, he may . . . justly be styled a ruthless savage and a moral monster; but he is not liable in damages for the child’s injury, or indictable under the statute for its death.”¹³

This so-called American bystander rule contrasts with the European bystander rule, common in Europe, that obligates individuals to intervene. Five American states, Hawaii, Minnesota, Rhode Island, Vermont, and Wisconsin, have laws that require individuals to call for help or to intervene in certain circumstances to protect another person so long as they themselves are not placed in danger. Good Samaritan laws, in contrast, protect individuals who intervene to assist a person in peril from lawsuits for damages and should not be confused with criminal liability for a failure to intervene.¹⁴

Most Americans would likely agree that an Olympic swimmer is morally obligated to rescue a young child drowning in a swimming pool. Why, then, is this not recognized as a legal duty in the United States? There are several reasons for the American bystander rule:

- Individuals intervening may be placed in jeopardy.
- Bystanders may misperceive a situation, unnecessarily interfere, and create needless complications.
- Individuals may lack the physical capacity and expertise to subdue an assailant or to rescue a hostage and place themselves in danger. This is the role of criminal justice professionals.
- The circumstances under which individuals should intervene and the acts required to satisfy the obligation to assist another would be difficult to clearly define.
- Criminal prosecutions for a failure to intervene would burden the criminal justice system.
- Individuals in a capitalist society are responsible for their own welfare and should not expect assistance from others.
- Most people will assist others out of a sense of moral responsibility, and there is no need for the law to require intervention.

Critics of the American bystander rule contend that there is little difference between pushing a child onto the railroad tracks and failing to intervene to ensure the child’s safety and that criminal liability should extend to both acts and omissions. This also would deter crime, because offenders may be reluctant to commit crimes in situations in which they anticipate that citizens will intervene. We can see how the readiness of passengers to confront terrorists on airplanes has prevented several attacks, most notably in the case of the “shoe bomber” Richard Reid. The European rule also assists in promoting a sense of community and regard for others.¹⁵

The conflict between law and morality was starkly presented in 1964 when thirty-eight residents of New York City were awakened by the desperate screams of Kitty Genovese, a twenty-eight-year-old woman returning home from work. Kitty parked her car in a lot roughly one hundred feet from her apartment and was confronted by Winston Moseley, a married father of two young children, who later would testify that he received emotional gratification from stalking women. The thirty-eight residents of the building turned on their lights and opened their windows and watched as Moseley returned on three separate occasions over a period of thirty-five minutes to stab Kitty seventeen times. The third time Moseley returned, he found that Kitty had crawled to safety inside a nearby apartment house, and he stabbed her in the throat to prevent her from screaming, attempted to rape her, and took $49 from her wallet. One person found the courage to persuade a neighbor to call the police, who arrived in two minutes to find Kitty's dead body. This event profoundly impacted the United States. Commentators asked whether we had become a society of passive bystanders who were concerned only with our own welfare.¹⁶

American criminal law does not impose a general duty on the individuals witnessing the murder of Kitty Genovese to intervene. There is a duty, however, to assist another under certain limited conditions. The primary requirement is that a duty must be imposed by either the common law or a statute.

- Status. The common law recognized that individuals possess an obligation to assist their child, spouse, or employee. In State v. Mally, the defendant was convicted of "hastening" the death of his wife who had fallen and broken both of her arms, precipitating severe shock and the degeneration of her kidneys. Michael Mally left his wife Kay alone in bed for two days, only bothering to provide her with a single glass of water. A Montana district court held that "the failure to obtain medical aid for one who is owed a duty is a sufficient degree of negligence to constitute involuntary manslaughter provided death results from the failure to act."¹⁷

- Statute. A duty to intervene may be created by a statute that imposes a duty of care. This may be a criminal statute requiring that a doctor report child abuse or a statute that sets forth the obligations of parents. In Craig v. State, the defendants followed the dictates of their religion and treated their child's fatal illness with prayer rather than medicine. They were subsequently convicted of failing to obtain medical care for their now-deceased six-year-old daughter. The court ruled that the parents had breached their duty under a statute that provided that a father and mother are jointly and individually responsible for the "support, care, nurture, welfare and education of their minor children." The statute failed to mention medical care, but the court had "no hesitancy in holding that it is embraced within the scope of the broad language used."¹⁸

- Contract. An obligation may be created by an agreement. An obvious example is a babysitter who agrees to care for children or a lifeguard employed to safeguard swimmers. In Commonwealth v. Pestinikas, Walter and Helen Pestinikas verbally agreed to provide shelter, food, and medicine to ninety-two-year-old Joseph Kly, who had been hospitalized with a severe weakness of the esophagus. Kly agreed to pay the Pestinikas $300 a month in return for food, shelter, care, and medicine. Kly was found dead of dehydration and starvation roughly nineteen months later. A Pennsylvania superior court ruled that although failure to provide food and medicine could not have been the basis for prosecuting a stranger who learned of Kly's condition, a "duty to act imposed by contract is legally enforceable and, therefore, creates a legal duty."¹⁹

- Assumption of a Duty. An individual who voluntarily intervenes to assist another is charged with a duty of care. In People v. Oliver, Oliver, knowing that Cornejo was extremely drunk, drove him from a bar to Oliver's home, where she assisted him to inject drugs. Cornejo collapsed on the floor, and Oliver instructed her daughter to drag Cornejo's body outside and hide him behind a shed. The next morning, Cornejo was discovered dead. A California superior court ruled that by taking Cornejo into her home, Oliver "took charge of a person unable to prevent harm to himself," and she "owed Cornejo a duty" that she breached by failing to summon medical assistance.²⁰

In People v. Burton, the defendants, Sharon Burton and Leroy Locke, were convicted of first-degree murder. On January 22, 1996, Sharon Burton passively watched Leroy Locke chase her daughter Dominique with a belt, after learning that she had had a "toilet training accident" on the carpet, while shouting "the little bitch pissed again." Locke then filled the bathtub with water and forced Dominique's head under the water three times for fifteen seconds at a time. Dominique's body reportedly went limp in the water, and Locke and Burton left the three-year-old unattended in the bathtub for thirty minutes while they played cards. Burton, after discovering Dominique's lifeless body, called her mother rather than authorities and later falsely reported to investigators that the child had fallen off the toilet. An Illinois appellate court found that Burton possessed knowledge that Dominique was being subjected to an ongoing pattern of abuse and that there was a substantial likelihood that Dominique would suffer death or great bodily harm.²¹

3.3 In May 1997, nineteen-year-old Jeremy Strohmeyer together with his friend David Cash played video games at a Las Vegas casino while Strohmeyer's father gambled.

Seven-year-old Sherrice Iverson threw a wet paper towel at Strohmeyer, and a paper towel fight ensued. He followed her into the restroom to continue the game. The forty-six-pound Iverson threw a yellow floor sign at Strohmeyer and then began screaming. Strohmeyer covered her mouth and forced her into a bathroom stall. David Cash wandered into the restroom to look for Strohmeyer. He peered over the stall and viewed Strohmeyer gripping and threatening to kill Sherrice. Cash allegedly made an unsuccessful effort to get Strohmeyer's attention and left the bathroom. Strohmeyer then molested Sherrice and strangled her to suffocate the screams. As he was about to leave, Strohmeyer decided to relieve Sherrice's suffering and twisted her head and broke her neck. He placed the limp body in a sitting position on the toilet with Sherrice's feet in the bowl.

Strohmeyer confessed to Cash and, after being apprehended by the police three days later, explained that he wanted to experience death. His lawyer argued that Strohmeyer was in a "dream-like state" as a result of a combination of alcohol, drugs, and stress. In order to avoid the death penalty, Strohmeyer pled guilty to first-degree murder, first-degree kidnapping, and sexual assault of a minor, all of which carry a life sentence in Nevada.

Iverson's mother called for Cash to be criminally charged, but Nevada law required him neither to intervene nor to report the crime to the police. The administration at the University of California at Berkeley responded to a student demonstration calling for Cash's dismissal by explaining that there were no grounds to expel him from the institution because he had not committed a crime. Cash, who was studying nuclear engineering, refused to express remorse, explaining that he was concerned about himself and was not going to become upset over other people's problems, particularly a little girl whom he did not know.

Should David Cash be held criminally liable for a failure to rescue Sherrice Iverson? See Joshua Dressler, Cases and Materials on Criminal Law, 3rd ed. (St. Paul, MN: West, 2003), pp. 133–134.

POSSESSION

State criminal codes punish a number of crimes involving the possession of contraband (material that is unlawful to possess or to manufacture). Statutes typically punish the possession of narcotics, firearms, ammunition and explosives, burglar tools, stolen property, and child pornography and obscenity.

Possession is a preparatory offense. The thinking is that punishing possession deters and prevents the next step—a burglary, sale of narcotics, or the use of a weapon in a robbery. The possession of contraband such as drugs and guns may also provoke conflict and violence.²² How does the possession of contraband meet the requirement that a crime involve a voluntary act or omission? This difficulty is overcome by requiring proof that the accused knowingly obtained or received the contraband (voluntary act) or failed to immediately dispose of the property.²³

There are a number of central concepts to keep in mind in understanding possession.

- Actual possession refers to drugs and other contraband within an individual's physical possession or immediate reach.
- Constructive possession refers to contraband that is outside of an individual's actual physical control but over which he or she exercises control through access to the location where the contraband is stored or through ability to control an individual who has physical control over the contraband. A drug dealer has constructive possession over narcotics stored in his or her home or under the physical control of a member of his or her gang.
- Joint possession refers to a situation in which a number of individuals exercise control over contraband. Several members of a gang may all live in the home where drugs are stored. There must be specific proof connecting each individual to the drugs. The fact that a gang member lives in the house is not sufficient.
- Fleeting possession permits an innocent individual to take momentary possession and dispose of an illegal object. An example is when a teacher removes and disposes of narcotics seized in the classroom.

Possession typically requires a criminal intent. MPC Section 2.01 provides that the “possessor” must have “knowingly procured or received the thing possessed” or “was aware of his control thereof for a sufficient period to have been able to terminate his possession.” In other words, the keys to possession are knowledge and either physical or constructive possession of the property.²⁴

Perhaps the most difficult cases involve determining which of the residents of a house or occupants of an automobile are in constructive possession of contraband. In State v. Cashen, Ross Cashen was convicted of possession of marijuana, and he appealed. Cashen was one of six occupants of an automobile. Four individuals, including Cashen and his girlfriend, were in the backseat. Cashen was sitting next to a window with his girlfriend on his lap.²⁵

An officer found a lighter and cigarette rolling papers on Cashen and cigarette rolling papers and a small baggie of marijuana seeds in his girlfriend's pants pocket. The officers found a baggie of marijuana wedged in the rear seat on the side where Cashen and his girlfriend had been seated. Both Cashen and his girlfriend stated that she owned the marijuana. The Iowa Supreme Court held that Cashen's physical closeness to the marijuana was not sufficient to prove possession beyond a reasonable doubt, and his conviction was overturned. His fingerprints were not on the bag of marijuana, the marijuana was not visible to the occupants of the car, and Cashen neither owned the car nor acted in a suspicious fashion when the police approached to search the automobile. Would you hold Cashen, his girlfriend, any of the passengers, or the driver liable for possession based on these facts? Would it make a difference to your answer if there was a large amount of marijuana in the backseat?

The doctrine of willful blindness holds an individual criminally liable who lacks actual knowledge of the existence of contraband although he or she is aware of a high probability of the existence of the contraband. Commentators note that individuals may not bury their head in the sand like an ostrich and thereby escape legal liability. Charles Jewell and a friend were approached in a Tijuana, Mexico, bar by a stranger who called himself “Ray.” Ray asked them if they wanted to buy marijuana, and when they refused, he offered to pay them $100 for driving a car across the border. Jewell accepted the offer, although his friend refused. Customs agents stopped Jewell at the border and opened the trunk and seized 110 pounds of marijuana concealed in a secret compartment between the trunk and rear seat. Jewell testified at trial that he had seen the special compartment when he opened the trunk and that he did not investigate further. The jury convicted Jewell of drug possession and concluded that if Jewell was not actually aware of the marijuana, his “ignorance was solely and entirely a result of a conscious purpose to avoid learning the truth.”²⁶

Possession = Knowledge of presence of object
 + exercise of dominion and control
 + knowledge of character of object.

MENS REA CRIMINAL INTENT

In the last section, we noted that a criminal offense ordinarily requires the concurrence between a criminal act (actus reus) and a criminal intent (mens rea) that cause a social harm prohibited under the law. The prosecutor is required to establish beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant possessed the required criminal intent.

It is said that one of the great contributions of the common law is to limit criminal punishment to “morally blameworthy” individuals who consciously choose to cause or to create a risk of harm or injury. Individuals are punished based on the harm caused by their decision to commit a criminal act rather than because they are “bad” or “evil people.” Former Supreme Court justice Robert Jackson observed that a system of punishment based on a criminal intent is intended to direct punishment at individuals who consciously choose between “good and evil.” Justice Jackson noted that this emphasis on individual choice and free will assumes that criminal law and punishment can deter people from choosing to commit crimes, and that those who do engage in crime can be encouraged through the application of punishment to develop a greater sense of moral responsibility in the future.²⁷

We all pay attention to intent in evaluating individuals’ behavior. You read in the newspaper that a rock star shot and killed one of her friends. There is no more serious crime than murder; yet, before condemning the killer, you want to know what was on her mind. The rock star may have intentionally aimed and fired the weapon. On the other hand, she may have aimed and fired the gun, believing that it was unloaded. We have the same act but a different reaction, based on whether the rock star intended to kill her friend or acted in a reckless fashion. As former Supreme Court justice Oliver Wendell Holmes Jr. famously observed, “even a dog distinguishes between being stumbled over and being kicked.”²⁸

It is a bedrock principle of criminal law that a crime requires an act or omission and a criminal intent. The importance of a criminal intent is captured by a frequently quoted phrase: “There can be no crime, large or small, without an evil mind” (actus non facit reum nisi mens sit rea).²⁹

The common law originally punished criminal acts and paid no attention to the mental element of an individual’s act. The killing of another was murder, whether committed intentionally or recklessly. Canon, or religious law, with its stress on sinfulness and moral guilt, helped to introduce the idea that punishment should depend on an individual’s “moral blameworthiness.” This came to be fully accepted in the American colonies. In 1978, the Supreme Court observed that mens rea is now the “rule of, rather than the exception to, the principles of American jurisprudence.”³⁰ There are two primary reasons that explain why the criminal law requires “moral blameworthiness.”

1. Responsibility. It is just and fair to hold a person accountable who intentionally chooses to commit a crime.
2. Deterrence. Individuals who act with a criminal intent pose a threat to society and should be punished in order to discourage them from violating the law in the future and in order to deter others from choosing to violate the law.

In many instances, it is difficult to establish a criminal intent beyond a reasonable doubt because we do not know what is going on inside an individual's mind. The easiest case is when an individual makes a statement of intent, such as "I will kill you," or makes a confession to the police. In most instances, we do not know what an individual is thinking and must rely on circumstantial evidence or the surrounding facts. In the Illinois case of People v. Conley, a district court found that the defendant possessed the intent to cause "permanent disability" based on the defendant's forcefully hitting the victim in the face with a full bottle of wine.³¹

Intent should not be confused with motive. Motive is the underlying reason that explains or inspires an individual to act. An individual who robs a bank may be motivated by greed or by a desire to feed his or her family. The individual's motive is not considered in determining whether the individual possessed a criminal intent and committed a criminal act. Motive may be considered by a judge at sentencing.

GENERAL AND SPECIFIC INTENT

The common law provided for two confusing categories of mens rea, a general intent and a specific intent. These continue to appear in various state statutes and decisions, although, as we shall see, a number of states have adopted the MPC framework.

A general intent is simply an intent to commit the actus reus or criminal act. There is no requirement that the prosecutors demonstrate that an offender possessed an intent to violate the law, an awareness that the act is a crime, or knowledge that the act will result in a particular type of harm. Proof of the defendant's general intent is typically inferred from the nature of the act and the surrounding circumstances. The crime of battery or a nonconsensual harmful touching provides a good illustration of a general intent crime. The prosecutor is required to establish only that the accused intended to commit an act that was likely to substantially harm another. In the case of a battery, this may be inferred from factors such as the force of the blow, the portion of the body that was targeted, and the defendant's statements and motive. Statutes that require a general intent typically use words such as willfully or intentionally.

A specific intent is a mental determination to accomplish a specific result. The prosecutor is required to demonstrate that the offender possessed the intent to commit the actus reus and then is required to present additional evidence that the defendant possessed the specific intent to accomplish a particular result. For example, a battery with an intent to kill requires proof of a battery along with additional evidence of a specific intent to murder the victim. Larceny requires the intent to and act of taking and carrying away property with the added intent permanently to deprive an individual of the property. The classic example is common law burglary. This requires the actus reus of breaking and entering and evidence of a specific intent to commit a felony inside the dwelling. Some commentators refer to these offenses as crimes of cause and result because the offender possesses the intent to "cause a particular result."

The difference between a specific intent and a general intent is nicely summarized by the Michigan Supreme Court: "The distinction between specific intent and general intent crimes is that the former involve a particular criminal intent beyond the act done, while the latter involve merely the intent to do the physical act."³²

Courts at times struggle with whether statutes require a general or specific intent. The consequences can be seen from the Texas case of Alvarado v. State. The defendant was convicted of "intentionally and knowingly" causing serious bodily injury to her child by placing him in a tub of hot water. The trial judge instructed the jury that they were merely required to find that the accused deliberately placed the child in the water to find her criminally liable. The appellate court overturned the conviction and ruled that the statute required the jury to find that the defendant possessed the intent to place the child in hot water, as well as the specific intent to inflict serious bodily harm.³³

Constructive intent is a third type of common law intent that was developed in situations in which a defendant lacked a specific intent, although a result was substantially likely to occur. This was applied in the early twentieth century to protect the public against reckless drivers; it provides that individuals who act with conscious disregard for the consequences of their actions are considered to intend the natural consequences of their actions. A reckless driver who caused an accident that resulted in death, under the doctrine of constructive intent, is guilty of a willful and intentional battery or homicide.

In 1980, in United States v. Bailey, the U.S. Supreme Court complained that the common law distinction between general and specific intent had caused a “good deal of confusion.” A 1972 survey of federal statutes found seventy-six different terms used to describe the required mental element of criminal offenses. This laundry list included terms such as intentionally, knowingly, fraudulently, designedly, recklessly, wantonly, unlawfully, feloniously, willfully, purposely, negligently, wickedly, and wrongfully.³⁴

Justice Robert Jackson noted “the variety . . . and confusion” of the judicial definition of the “elusive mental element” of crime. He observed that “[f]ew areas of criminal law pose more difficulty than the proper definition of mens rea required for a particular crime.”

The MPC introduced a new approach to determining criminal intent, which is discussed in the next section. Professor Dressler writes that “[n]o aspect of the Model Penal Code has had greater influence on the direction of American criminal law than Section 2.02 [on criminal intent].”³⁵

INTENT UNDER THE MODEL PENAL CODE

The MPC attempted to clearly define the mental intent required for crimes by providing four easily understood levels of responsibility. All crimes requiring a mental element (strict liability offenses do not) must include one of the four mental states provided in Section 2.02 of the MPC. These four types of intent, in descending order of culpability (responsibility), are as follows:

- Purposely
- Knowingly
- Recklessly
- Negligently

These criminal intents are illustrated in Table 3.2.

Purposely

The MPC established purposely as the most serious category of criminal intent. Purposely merely means that a defendant acted “on purpose” or “deliberately.” In legal terms, the defendant must possess a specific intent or “conscious object” to cause a result. A person acts purposely when his or her conscious object is to achieve a result. A murderer pulls the trigger with the purpose of killing the victim, a burglar breaks and enters with the purpose of committing a felony inside the dwelling, and a thief possesses the purpose of permanently depriving an individual of the possession of his or her property.

Table 3.2 Criminal Intent Under the Model Penal Code

Mental State	Illustration
Purposely	“You borrowed my car and wrecked it on purpose.”
Knowingly	“You may not have purposely wrecked my car, but you knew that you were almost certain to get in an accident because you had never driven such a powerful and fast automobile.”
Recklessly	“You may not have purposely wrecked my car, but you were driving over the speed limit on a rain-soaked and slick road in heavy traffic and certainly realized that you were extremely likely to get into an accident.”
Negligently	“You may not have purposely wrecked my car and apparently did not understand the power of the auto’s engine, but I cannot overlook your lack of awareness of the risk of an accident. After all, any reasonable person would have been aware that such an expensive sports car would pack a punch and would be difficult for a new driver to control.”

In State v. Sanborn, Sanborn attacked his wife, from whom he was separated, when she threatened to call his mother if he did not leave her apartment. Sanborn held his wife's head in an arm lock, hit her in the face four times, and beat her multiple times with a stainless steel toaster oven, a stainless steel coffee maker and carafe, and a microwave oven. Sanborn, while beating his wife, threatened to make her head explode and to kill her. The prosecution was required to establish that Sanborn acted with the "purpose" to cause serious bodily injury. The judge concluded that when Sanborn "slugs a five-foot-two-inch, 135-pound woman in the eye and side of the head and back of the head several times, and then attempts to smash down a microwave on her head, and then hits her with a toaster oven in the head, that is clearly . . . an attempt, a purposeful attempt . . . to cause serious bodily injury."³⁶

When he or she acts knowingly, an individual is aware that circumstances exist or a result is practically certain to follow from his or her conduct. An example of knowledge that circumstances exist is knowingly to "possess a firearm" or knowingly to possess narcotics. An illustration of a result that is practically certain to occur is a terrorist who bombs a public building knowing the people inside are likely to be maimed or injured, or to die.

Another example of a result that is practically certain to occur is State v. Fuelling. Michelle Fuelling left her twenty-three-month-old son, Raven, at home with her son's father, Carlos Mendoza. Mendoza beat Raven and inflicted severe brain injury and bruises resulting in Raven's death. An autopsy indicated that Raven's death resulted from severe head trauma. Mendoza was convicted of child abuse and murder.³⁷

The evidence indicated that Fuelling knew that Mendoza had abused Raven in the past and that her family had warned her about leaving Raven with Mendoza. Fuelling was convicted of having "knowingly acted in a manner that created a substantial risk to the life, body and health of Raven . . . by leaving [him] in the care of Carlos Mendoza, knowing that said Mendoza abused the child." The prosecution established that Fuelling knew that her conduct was "practically certain to endanger the child." Keep in mind that she likely did not have the purposeful intent of Mendoza injuring Raven, although she was held liable for being aware that he likely would endanger Raven.

Recklessly

A person acts recklessly when he or she is personally aware of a severe and serious risk and acts in such a fashion that demonstrates a clear lack of judgment and concern for the consequences. This is an objective test, and the defendant's behavior must be a clear departure from what would be expected of law-abiding individuals.

In Durkovitz v. State, Gary Durkovitz was convicted of the offense of recklessly causing serious bodily injury to a child. Durkovitz, an experienced animal trainer, took his 350-pound grown lion to a flea market in Houston on eight occasions and charged patrons to be photographed with the lion. The court found that the defendant was aware that there were a number of children at the flea market and that the lion posed a danger to the children because of the animal's predatory instincts. The animal had injured two children in the past. Durkovitz nonetheless took the lion into the flea market and secured him only with a short, heavy chain. Durkovitz lost control of the lion, which grabbed and attempted to crush a child's head in its mouth.³⁸

In State v. Williams, the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals noted other cases in which the court found the defendant possessed a reckless intent.³⁹

These include holding a child's feet under extremely hot water, ramming a parked car that had an 18-month-old child in it, twisting and pulling a baby's leg, . . . and speeding and running through stop signs with a child passenger. In other reckless injury cases, the defendant failed to perform an act that directly resulted in the injury. In one case the defendant was held to have recklessly caused bodily injury to her children by failing to report to the authorities that her boyfriend had violently kidnapped them. In still other cases the actors have left a disabled victim lying in bleach for at least an hour; failed to immediately seek medical help for a lethargic child; and left four-year-old twins unsupervised and wandering around an apartment complex.

Negligently

An individual who acts negligently is unaware of and disregards a substantial and unjustifiable risk that other individuals would be aware of and, like the reckless individual, grossly deviates from the standard of care that a reasonable person would exhibit under a similar set of circumstances.

Latrece Jones, age eighteen, was riding in the front passenger seat of a rented Chevrolet Cavalier in Chattanooga, Tennessee. Her two-year-old son, Carlon Bowens Jr., was asleep in her lap. Carlon's aunt, Letitia Abernathy, had rented the car and was driving the automobile; five children and one adult sat in the backseat. A car failed to yield the right of way, causing an accident, which led the passenger-side air bag to deploy.⁴⁰

The air bag struck Carlon, breaking his neck and killing him. Jones was charged with criminally negligent homicide. At the time of the accident, Tennessee's child restraint law required children under four years old to be in a "child passenger restraint system meeting federal motor vehicle standards." There also was evidence that a widespread media campaign in the past year had been directed at educating parents of the need to use child restraints and on the danger posed by air bags. This campaign, in part, was a recognition that it was only in 1999 that all automobiles were required to have air bags and that parents generally lacked knowledge of the danger posed by air bags. A newspaper study twelve days prior to the accident indicated that only 60 percent of children observed in motor vehicles were restrained and that a number of children continued to be seated in the front seat.

The Tennessee court concluded that the fact that there was a need for a large-scale public information campaign aimed at educating parents about child car safety indicates "how many people in the community simply were not using child safety restraints at the time of the accident. . . . If 40% of the children being transported in Ms. Jones' community were being transported without being properly restrained at the time of the accident, it would be difficult for a rational trier of fact to conclude that it was a gross deviation from the standard of care at the time of the accident for Ms. Jones to transport her child improperly."

As you might have concluded, it often is challenging to determine whether a defendant possessed a reckless or a negligent intent. In People v. Stanfield, Stanfield was convicted of reckless homicide. An appellate court held that the jury should have been provided the opportunity to determine whether the defendant was negligent rather than reckless. Stanfield pointed a pistol at his wife, whom he accused of being involved with another man during his absence. She told him to stop "fooling and slapped his hand." The gun discharged, fatally shooting his wife. Stanfield claimed that he neither pulled the trigger nor intended that she should be fatally shot. The appellate court held that "[i]t is obvious that one who fails to perceive the possible danger inherent in holding a gun to another when he has no intention of pulling a trigger is at least negligent. If he perceives the possibility that an outside blow, i.e., a slap of the hand, might discharge the weapon, then he is reckless. . . . It is the perception of possible risk to others which governs. On the evidence, the jury could easily have found that defendant was no more than negligent in not foreseeing the possibility of the slap."⁴¹

Keep in mind that purpose generally corresponds to the common law standard of specific intent and knowledge is thought to correspond to a general intent. Recklessness and negligence are based on the concept of constructive intent. New Jersey is a state that has adopted the MPC approach to criminal intent in order to achieve a clearer definition of the intent required for various crimes.⁴² New Jersey statute 2C:2-2 provides that "a person is not guilty of an offense unless he acted purposely, knowingly, recklessly or negligently, as the law may require, with respect to each material element of the offense."

In 1978, Arizona adopted the MPC mental states for all offenses in the criminal code.⁴³ In reading the text, keep in mind that you will encounter statutes that rely on both the common law and the MPC approaches to criminal intent.

The next section discusses transferred intent, a doctrine that imposes liability on an individual whose criminal act harms an individual who was not the intended victim of the crime.

TRANSFERRED INTENT

The doctrine of transferred intent first developed in England in 1575 in the case of Regina v. Saunders & Archer. Saunders gave his wife a poison apple. She took a bite out of the apple and handed it to her daughter, who died after finishing the apple. Saunders's intent to kill his wife was transferred to his daughter, and the judge convicted him of the intentional killing of his daughter, although his intent was to poison his wife.⁴⁴

The doctrine of transferred intent subsequently was adopted by courts in the United States. Transferred intent primarily is applied to cases of homicide and battery, although it applies to other types of crimes as well.

The California case of People v. Scott is one of the most important American cases on transferred intent. Calvin Hughes and Elaine Scott went through a bitter breakup of their relationship. Scott's two sons Damien Scott and Derrick Brown retaliated by attempting to shoot and kill Hughes. The bullet hit Hughes in the heel of his shoe and inadvertently killed Jack Gibson, an innocent teenager who was sitting in a nearby car.⁴⁵

The California Supreme Court relied on transferred intent to hold Scott and Brown liable for the death of Gibson. The court explained that a "defendant who shoots with an intent to kill but misses and hits a bystander instead should be punished for a crime of the same seriousness as the one he tried to commit against his intended victim." A shorthand way to understand transferred intent is to remember that the defendant's intent follows the bullet. Why does the law recognize transferred intent in "wrong aim" cases?

Individual accountability. Defendants should be held responsible for the result (murder) that they intended to achieve (murder) and did achieve (murder).

Justice. There is a social interest in punishing defendants whose acts create the social harm that they intended to commit despite the fact that the wrong individual is victimized.

STRICT LIABILITY OFFENSES

We all have had the experience of telling another person that "I don't care why you acted in that way; you hurt me, and that was wrong." This is similar to a strict liability offense.

A strict liability offense is a crime that does not require a mens rea, and an individual may be convicted based solely on the commission of a criminal act.

Strict liability offenses have their origin in the industrial development of the United States in the middle of the nineteenth century. The U.S. Congress and various state legislatures enacted a number of public welfare offenses that were intended to protect society against impure food, defective drugs, pollution, and unsafe working conditions, trucks, and railroads. These mala prohibita offenses (an act is wrong because it is prohibited) are distinguished from those crimes that are mala in se (inherently wrongful, such as rape, robbery, and murder).

The common law was based on the belief that criminal offenses required a criminal intent; this ensured that offenders were morally blameworthy. The U.S. Supreme Court has pronounced that the requirement of a criminal intent, although not required under the Constitution, is "universal and persistent in mature systems of law."⁴⁶ Courts, however, have disregarded the strong policy in favor of requiring a criminal intent in upholding the constitutionality of mala prohibita laws. Congress and state legislatures typically indicate that these are strict liability laws by omitting language such as "knowingly" or "purposely" from the text of the law. Courts look to several factors in addition to the textual language in determining whether a statute should be interpreted as providing for strict liability:

- The offense is not a common law crime.
- A single violation poses a danger to a large number of people.
- The risk of the conviction of an "innocent" individual is outweighed by the public interest in preventing harm to society.
- The penalty is relatively minor.
- A conviction does not harm a defendant's reputation.
- The law does not significantly impede the rights of individuals or impose a heavy burden. Examples are the prohibition of acts such as "selling alcohol to minors" or "driving without a license."
- These are acts that most people avoid, and individuals who engage in such acts generally possess a criminal intent.

The argument for strict liability offenses is that these laws deter unqualified people from participating in potentially dangerous activities, such as the production and selling of pharmaceutical drugs, and that those who engage in this type of activity will take extraordinary steps to ensure that they proceed in a cautious and safe fashion. There is also concern that requiring prosecutors to establish a criminal intent in these relatively minor cases will consume time and energy and divert resources from other cases.

Courts traditionally have read an intent requirement into criminal statutes punishing common law mala in se offenses such as murder, robbery, kidnapping, and larceny. Judges reason that these serious offenses should be punished only when accompanied by an intent to violate the law. In Morissette v. United States, the defendant trespassed on an old government bombing range and was convicted of carting three truckloads of old bomb casings that appeared to have been abandoned.⁴⁷ The Supreme Court held that the lower court judge had improperly concluded that because the statute did not mention a criminal intent this was a strict liability offense. The Court reasoned that Congress had modeled the statute punishing “whoever steals government property” on the common law crime of larceny, and the fact that the statute did not mention intent did not mean that Congress had intended to omit an intent requirement. Larceny historically had required an “evil-meaning mind and an evil-doing hand.”

There is a trend toward expanding strict liability into the non-public welfare crimes that carry relatively severe punishment. Many of these statutes are criticized for imposing prison terms without providing for the fundamental requirement of a criminal intent.

The U.S. Supreme Court indicated in Staples v. United States that it may not be willing to continue to accept the growing number of strict liability public welfare offenses.⁴⁸ The National Firearms Act was intended to restrict the possession of dangerous weapons and declared it a crime punishable by up to ten years in prison to possess a “machine gun” without legal registration. The defendant was convicted for possession of an AR-15 rifle, which is a semiautomatic weapon that can be modified to fire more than one shot with a single pull of the trigger. The Supreme Court interpreted the statute to require a mens rea, explaining that the imposition of a lengthy prison sentence has traditionally required that a defendant possess a criminal intent. The Court noted that gun ownership is widespread in the United States and that a strict liability requirement would result in the imprisonment of individuals who lacked the sophistication to determine whether they purchased or possessed a lawful or unlawful weapon.

A Michigan appellate court held that John Wesley Janes should not be held criminally liable for possession of a dangerous animal based on his pit bull’s attack on an infant absent Janes’s knowledge that the dog was dangerous. The court reasoned that dog ownership is widespread in the United States and the incidence of aggressive behavior by dogs is not so widespread to alert individuals that they should assume that absent a history of violent behavior a dog is a “dangerous animal.” The court observed that “we find it unthinkable that the Legislature intended to subject law-abiding, well-intentioned citizens to a possible four-year prison term if, despite genuinely and reasonably believing their animal to be safe around other people and animals, the animal nevertheless harms someone. . . . [W]e are reluctant to impute to our Legislature the intent of dispensing with the criminal-intent requirement when it would mean easing the path to convicting persons whose conduct would not even alert them to the probability of strict regulation” under the statute.⁴⁹

MPC Section 1.04(5) accepts the need for strict liability crimes, while limiting these crimes to what the code terms “violations.” Violations are not subject to imprisonment and are punishable only by a fine, forfeiture, or other civil penalty; and they may not result in the type of legal disability (e.g., loss of the right to vote) that flows from a criminal conviction. You can find some examples of strict liability offenses in Table 3.3.

CONCURRENCE OF ACT AND INTENT

We now have discussed both actus reus and mens rea. The next step is to understand that there must be a concurrency between a criminal act and a criminal intent. Chronological concurrence means that a criminal intent must exist at the same time as a criminal act. An example of chronological concurrence is the requirement that a burglary involves breaking and entering into the dwelling house of another at night with the intent to commit a felony therein. A defendant who claimed

Table 3.3 Strict Liability Offenses

Offense	Case Example
Open Bottle	Steven Mark Loge was cited for a violation of a Minnesota statute that declares it a misdemeanor for the owner of a motor vehicle, or the driver when the owner is not present, “to keep or allow to be kept in a motor vehicle when such vehicle is upon the public highway any bottle or receptacle containing intoxicating liquors or 3.2 percent malt liquors which has been opened.” Loge borrowed his father’s pickup truck and was stopped by two police officers while on his way home from work. One of the officers observed and seized an open beer bottle underneath the passenger’s side of the seat and also found one full unopened can of beer and one empty beer can in the truck. Loge was issued a citation for a violation of the open bottle statute. See State v. Loge , 608 N.W.2d 152 (Minn. 2000).
Students’ Possession of Weapons in School	A juvenile court ordered C.R.M. to attend an Anoka County, Minnesota, juvenile day school. Students’ coats are hung outside the classroom and inspected in the morning for contraband. A folding knife with a four-inch blade was discovered in C.R.M.’s coat. C.R.M. immediately reacted, “Oh man, I forgot to take it out, I was whittling this weekend.” C.R.M. was convicted under a statute that makes possession of a dangerous weapon on school property a strict liability offense. The Minnesota statute provides that “[w]hoever possesses, stores, or keeps a dangerous weapon or uses or brandishes a replica firearm or a BB gun on school property is guilty of a felony and may be sentenced to imprisonment for not more than two years or to payment of a fine of not more than $5,000, or both.” See In re C.R.M. , 611 N.W.2d 802 (Minn. 2000).
Teacher’s Possession of Weapons in School	A Virginia law makes it a felony for an individual to possess a firearm “upon any public . . . elementary school, including building and grounds.” Deena Esteban, a fourth-grade elementary school teacher, left a zippered yellow canvas bag in a classroom; the bag was found to contain a loaded .38 caliber revolver. Esteban explained that she placed the gun in the bag and took it to the store on the previous Saturday, and then she forgot that the pistol was in the bag and inadvertently carried it into the school. The Virginia Supreme Court affirmed Esteban’s conviction on appeal. The court stressed that the fact that Esteban “innocently” brought a loaded revolver into the school “does not diminish the danger.” A footnote in the decision indicated that Esteban possessed a concealed handgun permit that specifically did not authorize possession of a handgun on school property. See Esteban v. Commonwealth , 587 S.E.2d 523 (Va. 2003).

that he entered his mother’s home with the intent to escape the cold and contended that he only later developed the intent to kill his mother would not be guilty of burglary, if he was believed by the jury.⁵⁰ The principle of concurrence is reflected in Section 20 of the California Penal Code, which provides that in “every crime . . . there must exist a union or joint operation of act and intent or criminal negligence.”⁵¹

Concurrence = Mens rea (in unison with)
 + actus reus.

3.4 Scott Jackson administered what he believed was a fatal dose of cocaine to Pearl Bryan in Cincinnati, Ohio. Bryan was pregnant, apparently as a result of her intercourse with Jackson. Jackson and a companion then transported Bryan to Kentucky and cut off her head to prevent identification of the body. Bryan, in fact, was still alive when she was brought to Kentucky, and she died as a result of the severing of her head. A state possesses jurisdiction over offenses committed within its territorial boundaries. Can Jackson be prosecuted for the intentional killing of Bryan in Ohio? In Kentucky? See Jackson v. Commonwealth, 38 S.W. 422 (Ky. App. 1896).

CRIMINAL LAW AND PUBLIC POLICY

We have seen throughout this chapter that a crime requires the concurrence of a criminal act and a criminal intent. In 2014, Vonte Skinner was convicted of attempted murder and aggravated assault for allegedly attempting to carry out a contract killing of a narcotics dealer who had withheld the proceeds from narcotics sales from a drug gang. A search of the defendant's car led to the seizure of three notebooks filled with rap lyrics authored by Skinner. A number of the lyrics are described as "violent" and were written under the moniker "Real Threat." Skinner has the word Threat tattooed on his arm.

The jury was unable to reach a verdict at Skinner's first trial. He was convicted at a second trial in which a detective testifying for the state of New Jersey read excerpts from the defendant's lyrics, testimony that ran for thirteen pages in the trial transcript. The prosecution successfully argued that although none of the lyrics mentioned the victim by name and that all of the lyrics had been composed prior to the shooting, the lyrics provided evidence of the defendant's criminal motive and intent and capacity for violence. Several of the lyrics are reprinted below.

On the block, I can box you down or straight razor ox you down, run in your crib with a four pound and pop your crown. Checkmate, put your face in the ground. I'll drop your queen and pawn, f-k-f-k wastin' around. They don't call me Threat for nothin'.

You pricks goin' to listen to Threat tonight. 'Cause feel when I pump this P-89 into your head like lice. Slugs will pass ya' D, like Montana and rice, that's five hammers, 16 shots to damage your life, leave you f—s all bloody.

After you die, I'll go to your Mom's house and f-k her until tomorrow and make ya' little brother watch with his face full of sorrow.

So get them answers right. Where's the case and stash of white. I got ya' wife tied to the bed and at her throat a knife.

An appellate court reversed Skinner's conviction and expressed doubt whether the jurors would have found the defendant guilty if they had not listened to an "extended reading" of these lyrics.

The New Jersey Supreme Court found that there was no connection between the various crimes with which Skinner was charged and the bad acts recounted in the lyrics. "We reject the proposition that probative evidence about a charged offense can be found in an individual's artistic endeavors absent a strong nexus between specific details of the artistic composition and the circumstances of the offense for which the evidence is being adduced." The Supreme Court also noted the risk that the introduction of the lyrics had prejudiced the jury against the defendant.

In other cases, courts have found a strong connection between rap lyrics and a defendant's mental determination to kill. In Bryant v. State, 802 N.E.2d 486 (Ind. Ct. App. 2004), the defendant was convicted of the murder of his stepmother. His lyrics were admitted to establish his motive to kill because the lyrics closely resembled the crime with which the defendant was charged. "'Cuz the 5-0 won't even know who you are when they pull yo ugly ass out of the trunk of my car." In the South Carolina trial of Gonzales Wardlaw (Snoop), the defendant's lyrics were introduced as an admission of guilt to a murder, and in a Pittsburgh case, two men were sentenced to prison after posting a rap video that threatened to harm two police officers who had arrested them.

Law enforcement officials now are trained to use rap lyrics to assist them in investigating crimes. The New York Times identified dozens of cases between 2012 and 2014 in which prosecutors attempted to introduce rap music at a defendant's trial. The American Civil Liberties Union of New Jersey found that courts admitted lyrics roughly 80 percent of the time. Studies find that juries are more likely to believe that defendants who have written violent rap lyrics are capable of committing a murder than defendants who have not written violent lyrics.

Commentators familiar with the culture of rap music point out that the lyrics are not necessarily autobiographical and that gangsta rap is characterized by exaggeration and violent and sexual language. Artists remain in "character" even when not performing to persuade their audience that they are "authentic" and "credible." Commentators also note that law enforcement officials are able to distinguish between the reality and fiction when it comes to other forms of music but do not seem willing to make this distinction when it comes to young African American artists. Under what circumstances should rap music be viewed as evidence of criminal intent and motive rather than artistic expression?

CAUSALITY

You now know that a crime entails a mens rea that *concur*s with an actus reus. The defendant must be shown to have caused the victim's death or injury, or to have damaged the property.

Causation is central to criminal law and must be proven beyond a reasonable doubt. The requirement of causality is based on two considerations:

1. Individual Responsibility. The criminal law is based on individual responsibility. Causality connects a person's acts to the resulting social harm and permits the imposition of the appropriate punishment.
2. Fairness. Causality limits liability to individuals whose conduct produces a prohibited social harm. A law that declares that all individuals in close proximity to a crime are liable regardless of their involvement would be unfair and would penalize people for being in the wrong place at the wrong time. If such a law were enacted, individuals might hesitate to gather in crowds or bars or to attend concerts and sporting events.

Establishing that a defendant's criminal act caused harm to the victim can be more complicated than you might imagine. Should an individual who commits a rape be held responsible for the victim's subsequent suicide? What if the victim attempted suicide a week before the rape and then killed herself following the rape? Would your answer be the same if the stress induced by the rape appeared to have contributed to the victim's contracting cancer and dying a year later? What if doctors determine that a murder victim who was hospitalized would have died an hour later of natural causes?

We can begin to provide an answer to these hypothetical situations by reviewing the two types of causes that a prosecutor must establish beyond a reasonable doubt at trial in order to convict a defendant: cause in fact and legal or proximate cause.

You will find that most causality cases involve defendants charged with murder who claim that they should not be held responsible for the victim's death.

Cause in Fact

The cause in fact or factual cause simply requires you to ask whether "but for" the defendant's act, the victim would have died. An individual aims a gun at the victim, pulls the trigger, and kills the victim. "But for" the shooter's act, the victim would be alive. In most cases, the defendant's act is the only factual cause of the victim's injury or death and is clearly the direct cause of the harm. This is a simple cause-and-effect question. The legal or proximate cause of the victim's injury or death may not be so easily determined.

A defendant's act must be the cause in fact or factual cause of a harm in order for the defendant to be criminally convicted. This connects the defendant to the result. The cause in fact or factual cause is typically a straightforward question. Note that the defendant's act must also be the legal or proximate cause of the resulting harm.

Legal or Proximate Cause

Just when things seem simple, we encounter the challenge of determining the legal or proximate cause of the victim's death. Proximate cause analysis requires the jury to determine whether it is fair or just to hold a defendant legally responsible for an injury or death. This is not a scientific question. We must consider questions of fairness and justice. There are few rules to assist us in this analysis.

In most cases, a defendant is clearly both the cause in fact and legal cause of the victim's injury or death. However, consider the following scenarios: You pull the trigger, and the victim dies. You point out that it was not your fault, since the victim died from the wound you inflicted in combination with a minor nonlethal gun wound that she suffered earlier in the day. Should you be held liable? In another scenario, an ambulance rescues the victim, the ambulance's brakes fail, and the vehicle crashes into a wall, killing the driver and victim. Are you or the driver responsible for the victim's death? You later learn that the victim died after the staff of the hospital emergency room waited five hours to treat the victim and that she would have lived had she received timely assistance. Who is responsible for the death? Would your answer be different in the event that the doctors protested that they could not operate on the victim because of a power outage caused by a hurricane? What if the victim was wounded from the gunshot and, although barely conscious, stumbled into the street and was hit by an automobile or by lightning? In each case, "but for" your act, the victim would not have been placed in the situation that led to his or her death. On the other hand, you might argue that in each of these examples you were not legally liable, because the death resulted from an intervening cause or outside factor rather than from the shooting. As you can see from the previous examples, an intervening cause may arise from any of the following:

- The act of the victim wandering into the street
- An act of nature, such as a hurricane
- The doctors who did not immediately operate
- A wound inflicted by an assailant in combination with a previous injury

Another area that complicates the determination of proximate cause is a victim's preexisting medical condition. This arises when you shoot an individual and the shock from the wound results in the failure of the victim's already seriously weakened heart.

Intervening Cause

Professor Dressler helps us address these causation problems by providing two useful categories of intervening acts: coincidental intervening acts and responsive intervening acts.

Coincidental Intervening Acts

A defendant is not considered legally responsible for a victim's injury or death that results from a coincidental intervening act. (Some texts refer to this as an independent intervening cause.) A coincidental intervening act is a cause that is unrelated to a criminal act of the accused. Coincidental intervening acts arise when a defendant's act places a victim in a particular place where the victim is harmed by an unforeseeable event.

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals offered an example of an unforeseeable event as hypothetical in the case of United States v. Main. The defendant in this example drives in a reckless fashion and crashes his car, pinning the passenger in the automobile. The defendant leaves the scene of the accident to seek assistance, and the semiconscious passenger is eaten by a bear. The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals observed that reckless driving does not create a foreseeable risk of being eaten by a bear and that this intervening cause is so out of the ordinary that it would be unfair to hold the driver responsible for the victim's death.⁵² Another example of an unforeseeable coincidental intervening event involves a victim who is wounded, taken to the hospital for medical treatment, and then killed in the hospital by a knife-wielding mass murderer. Professor Dressler notes that in this case, the unfortunate victim has found himself or herself in the "wrong place at the wrong time."⁵³

Responsive Intervening Acts

The response of a victim to a defendant's criminal act is termed a responsive intervening act (some texts refer to this as a dependent intervening act). In most instances, the defendant is considered responsible because his or her behavior caused the victim to respond. A defendant is relieved of responsibility only in those instances in which the victim's reaction to the crime is both abnormal and unforeseeable. Consider the case of a victim who jumps into the water to evade an assailant and drowns. The assailant will be charged with the victim's death despite the fact that the victim could not swim and did not realize that the water was dangerously deep. The issue is the foreseeability of the victim's response rather than the reasonableness of the victim's response. Again, courts generally are not sympathetic to defendants who set a chain of events in motion, and they generally will hold such defendants criminally liable.

In People v. Armitage, David Armitage was convicted of "drunk boating causing [the] death" of Peter Maskovich. Armitage was operating his small aluminum speedboat at a high rate of speed while zigzagging across the river, when it flipped over. There were no flotation devices on board, and the intoxicated Armitage and Maskovich clung to the capsized vessel. Maskovich disregarded Armitage's warning, decided to try to swim to shore, and drowned. A California appellate court ruled that Maskovich's decision did not break the chain of causation. The "fact that the panic stricken victim recklessly abandoned the boat and tried to swim ashore was not a wholly abnormal reaction to the peril of drowning," and Armitage could not exonerate himself by claiming that the "victim should have reacted differently or more prudently."⁵⁴

Defendants have also been held liable for the response of individuals other than the victim. For instance, in the California case of People v. Schmies, defendant Schmies fled on his motorcycle from a traffic stop at speeds of up to ninety miles an hour and disregarded all traffic regulations. During the chase, one of the pursuing patrol cars struck another vehicle, killing the driver and injuring the officer. Schmies was convicted of grossly negligent vehicular manslaughter and of reckless driving. A California court affirmed the defendant's conviction based on the fact that the officer's response and the resulting injury were reasonably foreseeable. The officer's reaction, in other words, was not so extraordinary that it was unforeseeable, unpredictable, and statistically extremely improbable.⁵⁵

Medical negligence has also consistently been viewed as foreseeable and does not break the chain of causation. In People v. Saavedra-Rodriguez, the defendant claimed that the negligence of the doctors at the hospital rather than the knife wound he inflicted was the proximate cause of the death and that he should not be held liable for homicide. The Colorado Supreme Court ruled that medical negligence is "too frequent to be considered abnormal" and that the defendant's stabbing of the victim started a chain of events, the natural and probable result of which was the defendant's death. The court added that only the most gross and irresponsible medical negligence is so removed from normal expectations as to be considered unforeseeable.⁵⁶

In sum, a defendant who commits a crime is responsible for the natural and probable consequences of his or her actions. A defendant is responsible for foreseeable responsive intervening acts.

The MPC eliminates legal or proximate causation and requires only "but-for causation." The code merely asks whether the result was consistent with the defendant's intent or knowledge or was within the scope of risk created by the defendant's reckless or negligent act. In other words, under the MPC, you merely look at the defendant's intent and act and ask whether the result could have been anticipated. In cases of a resulting harm or injury that is "remote" or "accidental" (e.g., a lightning bolt or a doctor who is a serial killer), the MPC requires that we look to see whether it would be unjust to hold the defendant responsible.

Act and Intent	Case Examples
Apparent Safety Doctrine	In an 1856 North Carolina case, Preslar kicked and choked his wife and beat her over the head with a thirty-inch-thick piece of wood. He also threatened to kill her with his axe. The victim gathered her children and walked over two miles to her father's home. Reluctant to reveal her bruises and injuries to her family, she spread a quilt on the ground and covered herself with cotton fabric and slept outside. The combination of the exhausting walk, her injuries, and the biting cold led to a weakened condition that resulted in her death. The victim's husband was acquitted by the North Carolina Supreme Court, which ruled that the chain of causation was broken by the victim's failure to seek safety. The court distinguished this case from the situation of a victim who in fleeing is forced to wade through a swamp or jump into a river. Is it relevant that the victim likely feared that her family would force her to return to her marital home and that she would have to face additional physical abuse from her husband? See State v. Preslar , 48 N.C. 421 (1856).
Drag Racing	In Velazquez v. State , the defendant Velazquez and the deceased Alvarez agreed to drag race their automobiles over a quarter-mile course on a public highway. Upon completing the race, Alvarez suddenly turned his automobile around and proceeded east toward the starting line. Velazquez also reversed direction. Alvarez was in the lead and attained an estimated speed of 123 miles per hour. He was not wearing a seat belt and had a blood alcohol level of between .11 and .12. Velazquez had not been drinking and was traveling at roughly 90 miles per hour. As both approached the end of the road, they applied their brakes, but Alvarez was unable to stop. He crashed through the guardrail and was propelled over a canal and landed on the far bank. Alvarez was thrown from his car, pinned under the vehicle when it landed, and died. The defendant crashed through the guardrail, landed in the canal, and managed to escape. A Florida district court of appeal determined that the defendant's reckless operation of his vehicle in the drag race was technically the cause in fact of Alvarez's death under the "but for" test. There was no doubt that "but for" the defendant's participation, the deceased would not have recklessly raced his vehicle and would not have been killed. The court, however, ruled that the defendant's participation was not the proximate cause of the deceased's death because the "deceased, in effect, killed himself by his own volitional reckless driving," and that it "would be unjust to hold the defendant criminally responsible for this death." The race was completed when Alvarez turned his car around and engaged in a "near-suicide mission." See Velazquez v. State , 561 So.2d 347 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1990).
Medical Negligence	In United States v. Hamilton , the defendant knocked the victim down and jumped on him and kicked his face. The victim was rushed to the hospital, where nasal tubes were inserted to enable him to breathe, and his arms were restrained. During the night, the nurses changed his bedclothes and negligently failed to reattach the restraints on the victim's arms. Early in the morning the victim went into convulsions, pulled out the nasal tubes, and suffocated to death. The federal court held that regardless of whether the victim accidentally or intentionally pulled out the tubes, the victim's death was the ordinary and foreseeable consequence of the attack and affirmed the defendant's conviction for manslaughter. See United States v. Hamilton , 182 F. Supp. 548 (D.D.C. 1960).
Removal From Life Support	The defendant was convicted of vehicular manslaughter when the Toyota Camry he was driving struck a Chrysler LeBaron driven by William Patrick from behind. The LeBaron "sailed over the curb and slid along the guardrail, crashing into a utility pole before it ultimately came to rest 152 feet from the site of impact." The defendant's blood alcohol level was estimated at .18 or .19. As a result of the accident, Patrick suffered broken bones, paralysis, infections, organ failure, an inability to breathe on his own, brain damage, and severe psychological problems. Five months following the accident, Patrick's family in accordance with his wishes removed him from a ventilator, and he died two hours later. The New Jersey Supreme Court held that removal of life-sustaining treatment is a victim's right, and it is foreseeable that a victim may exercise his or her right not to be placed on, or to be removed from, life support systems. See State v. Pelham , 824 A.2d 1082 (N.J. 2003).

The Legal Equation

Causality	=	Cause in fact
	+	legal or proximate cause.
Cause in fact	=	“But for” the defendant’s criminal act, the victim would not be injured or dead.
Legal or proximate cause	=	Whether it is just or fair to hold the defendant criminally responsible.
Intervening acts	=	Coincidental intervening acts limit liability where unforeseeable; responsive intervening acts limit liability where unforeseeable and abnormal.

3.5 Defendant Israel Cervantes and fellow gang members of the Highland Street gang went to a birthday party for a member of the Alley Boys gang. The two gangs were not enemies. Cervantes approached a woman named Grace who refused his invitation to go to another party. Cervantes called her a “ho,” and the two exchanged insults. Juan Cisneros, a member of the Alley Boys, told Cervantes that he was disrespecting his “homegirl.” Richard Linares, a member of the Alley Boys, tried to calm the situation. Cisneros, however, drew a gun and threatened to “cap” Cervantes.

Cervantes pulled out his own gun. Linares responded by “pushing or touching” Cervantes in an effort to separate him from Cisneros. The defendant Cervantes stated that “nobody touches me” and shot Linares through the arm and chest. A large-scale fight ensued between the gangs, and gang “challenges were exchanged.”

A short time later, a group of Highland Street gang members saw Hector Cabrera, a member of the Alley Boys, entering his car. Five gang members fired shots and participated in killing Cabrera.

Would you hold Cervantes liable for the murder of Cabrera? See People v. Cervantes, 29 P3d 225 (Cal. 2001).

CASE ANALYSIS

In State v. Gargus, the defendant, a certified nurse assistant (CNA), voluntarily assumed care of her eighty-one-year-old mother who was suffering from diabetes and had lost the capacity to walk. A Missouri appellate court was asked to decide whether the defendant possessed a duty to care for her mother and knowingly violated her duty of care by failing to provide her mother with adequate medical care and as a result was guilty of elder abuse.

Did Gargus Possess a Duty of Care Toward Her Mother, and Did Gargus’s Breach of Her Duty of Care Cause the Death of Her Mother?

State v. Gargus*, No. ED 99233 (Mo. 2013)

Gargus was convicted of the felony of elder abuse in the first degree stemming from the death of her mother, Lorraine Gargus (the victim), while in Gargus’s care.

“A person commits the crime of elder abuse in the first degree if he attempts to kill, knowingly causes or attempts to cause serious physical injury . . . to any person sixty years of age or older. . . .” Criminal liability is premised on conduct involving voluntary acts. Voluntary acts include “[a]n omission to perform an act of which the actor is physically capable.” The defendant was sentenced to ten years in prison.

The victim was an eighty-one-year-old woman suffering from diabetes. After falling in 2005, the victim determined she was unable to walk anymore and became bedbound. Gargus started staying with the victim and Gargus’s father in 2008 to help out, and by December 2009 she had moved in to care for them. In January 2010, Gargus quit her job at the Clark County Nursing Home, where she had worked since 1973, to care for her parents full-time.

Gargus testified she cooked for the victim, gave her daily sponge baths, and changed her clothes daily. The victim had been using a bedpan, but in January 2010, she became incontinent. Gargus tried to give the victim her medicine, but the victim resisted medication, frequently hiding it or throwing it away.

Gargus first noticed a bedsore the size of a tennis ball on the victim’s upper buttocks on January 20, 2010. To care for the bedsore, Gargus continued using egg crate and fleece cushioning for the victim’s bed, stopped using Depends diapers on the victim to allow the sore to get air, and attempted to turn the victim every hour—however, the victim was reluctant to change positions, and Gargus described it as a “constant battle.” The victim’s husband died on January 31, 2010. At the funeral, family members indicated they wanted to visit the victim, but Gargus discouraged visits. After her husband’s death, the victim stopped eating and did not want to drink.

Cindy Hickman (Cindy), the victim’s granddaughter, visited the victim on February 2, 2010, and described the mobile home as dirty and smelly. The victim’s bed was located in the living room with animal cages stacked around it from floor to ceiling. Cindy testified there were “hundreds” of mice everywhere. The victim was completely covered in a blanket and her eyes were matted shut and she did not recognize Cindy, calling her by her sister Sylvia Winger’s name.

On February 22, 2010, Gargus called an ambulance after noticing a wound on the victim’s foot. She had bathed the victim that morning and put lotion on her feet, but did not see an injury. The victim generally kept her feet uncovered, so any injury would be obvious. Gargus’s son alerted her to the injury later that day. . . . The emergency personnel testified that the victim appeared confused and complained of a burning sensation in her rectum. As they moved the victim from her bed to the stretcher, a large mouse or small rat ran out of the bedclothes.

Dr. Neville Crenshaw . . . who was the victim’s attending doctor, testified that when the victim was admitted to the hospital she was “acutely and critically ill.” The victim had several large bedsores in various stages of development. The main bedsore was on the victim’s upper buttocks, and Dr. Crenshaw described it as a “huge, gaping, infected wound.” The infection had eaten the skin and subcutaneous fat around the bedsore, and an investigator for the Missouri Department of Health and Senior Services (DHSS) testified she could see the victim’s tailbone through the basketball-sized wound. The infection tested positive for staphylococcus (staph) and had turned septic—that is, had spread to her bloodstream. The surgical floor nurse testified the bedsore smelled like rotting flesh. As well, the emergency room nurse testified the victim had open sores over most of her body and large bedsores on her heels.

Dr. Crenshaw further testified that the victim’s second main injury was the trauma to her left foot. Her skin and tissue were removed down to tendon and bone, consistent with having been eaten by a rodent, as witnessed by the emergency personnel. . . . The following day, an orthopedic surgeon amputated the victim’s leg and foot below the knee. He noted the leg was no longer getting any blood supply and was cold and blue. Moreover, he could feel gas under the skin, consistent with gangrene. Last, Dr. Crenshaw testified the victim was malnourished and “profoundly dehydrated.”

The victim died on March 11, 2010. Her autopsy revealed that the cause of death was multiple-organ failure due to septicemia, stemming from the multiple bedsores and gangrene of the left foot. The medical examiner testified that the victim’s death was caused by the bedsore on her back, and that early care of the bedsore could have stopped the disease from progressing. He noted bedsores occur when patients lie on their backs for long periods of time without moving. He further testified the failure to provide a clean environment, movement treatment for the bedsore, and medical care also led to the victim’s death.

The record shows that Gargus had worked in a nursing home since 1973 and had been a CNA since 1989. Her supervisor testified that all CNAs received continuing training in infection control, pressure areas, and skin care. More importantly, Gargus’s own testimony revealed that she knew of the importance of preventing and treating bedsores. . . . Despite Gargus’s admitted knowledge about the treatment of bedsores and her testimony that she bathed the victim every day and saw the victim’s body daily, Gargus let the bedsore progress to Stage IV before calling for medical assistance. When the victim was admitted to the hospital, the bedsore was a “huge, gaping, infected wound” through which the victim’s tailbone was visible.

Moreover, when the victim was admitted to the hospital, she was malnourished and dehydrated. Gargus testified that the victim stopped eating when her husband died on January 31, yet Gargus did not call for medical assistance until February 22. . . . Further, despite Gargus's testimony that she bathed the victim daily and rubbed lotion on the victim's feet as late as February 22, she somehow failed to notice that the victim's left leg was not getting any blood supply, was cold and blue, and had gas under the skin consistent with gangrene. The jury was entitled to infer that as a trained CNA, Gargus knew that failing to seek treatment for a diabetic whose leg was in such a necrotic condition was practically certain to cause serious physical injury or harm to the victim. Last, as a CNA, Gargus was trained in the importance of hygiene, but isolated the victim in a mobile home infected with mice that had feces on the floor, molding food in the kitchen, and a nonworking bathroom. Moreover, Gargus stated to investigators that she washed the victim's clothing in flea-ridden, foul-smelling muddy gray water. Because she was a CNA trained in the importance of hygiene, the jury could infer Gargus knew the condition of the home was certain to cause serious physical injury or harm to the victim, a diabetic with multiple bedsores in various stages of development. Indeed, the victim later died of a massive infection.

The evidence shows that Gargus had a duty to act to prevent injury to the victim and that Gargus knew about but failed to provide the proper treatment of bedsores, failed to ensure the victim ate and drank, and failed—despite her twenty-plus years as a CNA—to notice the condition of the victim's leg. . . . Therefore, we find there was sufficient evidence from which a reasonable trier of fact could conclude Gargus knowingly caused serious physical injury to the victim.

CHAPTER SUMMARY

A crime requires the concurrence of a criminal intent (mens rea) and criminal act (actus reus). An act, for purposes of the criminal law, must be a voluntary act. An individual also may be held liable for a failure to act in those instances in which law imposes a duty to act. A duty arises when there is a status relationship, statute, or contract, or when an individual assumes a duty. The possession of contraband constitutes an act.

A significant contribution of the common law is limiting criminal punishment to individuals who possess a "guilty mind." The common law established three types of criminal intent: specific intent, general intent, and constructive criminal intent. These intent standards proved confusing, and the Model Penal Code attempted to simplify the intent standard by establishing a hierarchy of criminal intent standards. The most serious intent standard is purposely, followed by knowingly, recklessly, and the least serious form of intent, negligently. A fifth type of intent is strict liability.

As noted, there must be a concurrence between a criminal act and a criminal intent. The criminal act must be the cause or proximate cause of a prohibited harm. This analysis is complicated by intervening causes. Individuals are not held liable for coincidental intervening causes, although they are held liable for responsive intervening causes.
