Did the police constitutionally obtain the defendant’s confession to murder?

Dr. Jeffrey Metzner, a psychiatrist employed by the state hospital, testified that respondent was suffering from chronic schizophrenia and was in a psychotic state at least as of August 17, 1983, the day before he confessed. Metzner’s interviews with respondent revealed that respondent was following the “voice of God.” This voice instructed respondent to withdraw money from the bank, to buy an airplane ticket, and to fly from Boston to Denver. When respondent arrived from Boston, God’s voice became stronger and told respondent either to confess to the killing or to commit suicide. Reluctantly following the command of the voices, respondent approached Officer Anderson and confessed.

Dr. Metzner testified that, in his expert opinion, respondent was experiencing “command hallucinations.” This condition interfered with respondent’s “volitional abilities; that is, his ability to make free and rational choices.”

Core Concepts and Summary Statements

Introduction
A. Confessions are an efficient method of crime investigation and detection. An admission of responsibility and guilt is an important step toward a defendant’s rehabilitation.

B. One risk of relying too heavily on interrogations is coerced and false confessions. The poor and uneducated are likely to be particularly vulnerable to coercion and trickery. Confessions, in effect, result in guilt being determined at the pretrial stage rather than in a trial courtroom presided over by a judge and decided by a jury.

C. The constitutional regulation of interrogations is designed to assure that confessions are the product of fair and regular procedures and are not the result of police coercion.

D. There are three constitutional approaches to regulating confessions: the involuntariness test based on the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment and of the Fourteenth Amendment, the Miranda rule that is required under the Fifth Amendment, and the protection accorded under the Sixth Amendment right to counsel.

Due Process
A. The due process test asks whether a confession was voluntary or involuntary. To be admissible in evidence, a confession must have been made freely and voluntarily without compulsion or inducement. It must not be the product of physical or psychological coercion that overcomes the will of an individual to resist. Involuntary confessions are inadmissible in evidence.

B. In determining whether a confession is voluntary, courts apply a “totality-of-the-circumstances” test. Relevant factors include the application of physical abuse or psychological coercion; the time, length, circumstances, and place of the interrogation; and the age and education of the detainee, along with other considerations.

C. At various times, courts have indicated that the due process test is intended to assure reliable confessions, to eliminate offensive police methods, to make certain that confessions are the result of fundamentally fair procedures, and to ensure that confessions are the product of a rational and free choice.

D. The due process test is subject to various criticisms. The major criticism is that there is a lack of clear standards and that, as a result, the test fails to provide guidance to the police or courts.

The McNabb–Mallory Rule
The Supreme Court sought clearer standards regulating police interrogations. In McNabb v. United States (1943) and Mallory v. United States (1957), the Court held that federal law enforcement officers were required to bring criminal suspects immediately before a judge. Confessions obtained in violation of this rule were inadmissible in evidence.
Escobedo v. Illinois
In Escobedo v. Illinois (1964), the Supreme Court extended the Sixth Amendment right to counsel to interrogations by state as well as federal law enforcement officials. A defendant was to be informed of the right to silence and the right to an attorney prior to interrogation.

Custodial Interrogation
The Miranda warnings are triggered by placing an individual in custody and subjecting the individual to interrogation. The Miranda decision defines custodial interrogation as “questioning initiated by law enforcement officers after a person has been taken into custody or otherwise deprived of his [or her] freedom of action in any significant way.” In determining whether an individual who has not been subjected to custodial arrest is subjected to custodial interrogation, courts ask whether, based on the totality of the circumstances, a reasonable person would believe that he or she was being subjected to a degree of custody consistent with being subjected to custodial arrest.

The Right Against Self-Incrimination
A. The Self-Incrimination Clause of the Fifth Amendment provides that “[n]o person...shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself.” This right was extended to the states in Malloy v. Hogan (1964).
B. The right against self-incrimination reflects the fact that the United States has an adversarial system in which the state has the burden of proving an individual’s guilt beyond a reasonable doubt and in which the defendant is not required to take the stand or to offer evidence at trial.
C. The right against self-incrimination extends only to testimonial evidence that is incriminating. Testimonial evidence communicates facts, thoughts, and ideas and is incriminating because it may lead to a criminal charge.

Miranda v. Arizona
A. Miranda v. Arizona provides that statements of an individual subjected to custodial interrogation by the police may not be introduced into evidence absent procedural safeguards protecting an individual’s Fifth Amendment rights. Miranda requires that the police warn individuals of their right to remain silent, that anything they say may be used against them, and that they have the right to an attorney appointed or retained.
B. In Dickerson v. United States (2000), the Supreme Court ruled that Miranda was a “constitutional decision” and that the Miranda warnings were required by the Fifth Amendment to protect a defendant’s right against self-incrimination. The federal and state law enforcement agents were required as a matter of law to provide criminal suspects the Miranda warnings.

Waiver
A. The Supreme Court stressed in Miranda that the government must meet a “heavy burden” in demonstrating that a suspect voluntarily, knowingly, and intelligently waived his or her rights. According to the Miranda decision, a waiver requires an express statement and may not be presumed from the fact that an accused is silent following the warnings.
B. In determining whether a confession was voluntary, a court will examine the totality of the circumstances. The primary focus is on the interrogation techniques employed by the police. The likely impact of these techniques will be evaluated in light of the age, education, background, and other characteristics of the accused; the conditions of the interrogation; and the length of the interrogation and of the detention prior to the reading of the Miranda rights.
C. A police officer may not automatically conclude that an individual knowingly and intelligently waived his or her rights. In determining whether a waiver is knowing and intelligent, a court will consider the totality of the circumstances on a case-by-case basis. Courts also will examine a defendant’s emotional stability, ability to think clearly during the interrogation, general intelligence, and prior experience with the criminal justice system.
D. In considering whether a juvenile has waived his or her rights, a court inquires into the “juvenile’s age, experience, education, background, and intelligence and into whether he [or she] has the capacity to understand the warnings given him [or her], the nature of his [or her] Fifth Amendment rights, and the consequences of waiving those rights.”
E. A waiver may be express, a direct affirmative act, or implied from a course of conduct by a defendant indicating that he or she consented to a waiver.

Invoking the Miranda Rights
Following the reading of the Miranda rights, the defendant has the opportunity to assert his or her right to a lawyer or right to silence or to waive these rights. The Supreme Court held that an individual intending to “articulate his desire to have counsel present” must express this “sufficiently clearly that a reasonable police officer in the circumstances would understand the statement to be a request for an attorney.” This same level of clarity is required for invoking the right to silence.

The Public Safety Exception
In New York v. Quarles, the Supreme Court recognized a public safety exception to Miranda. This exception permits the police to ask questions reasonably prompted by a reasonable concern with public safety without first advising a suspect of his or her Miranda rights.

The Miranda Warnings
The three-part Miranda warnings inform suspects of their rights and the consequences of waiving these rights. These warnings require the police to inform individuals of the right to remain silent, that anything they say may be used against them, and of the right to an attorney retained or appointed. The Miranda judgment specifies that these rights must be recited in “clear and unequivocal terms” and that a suspect must be “clearly informed” of his or her rights.

Invoking the Miranda Rights
Following the reading of the Miranda rights, the defendant has the opportunity to assert his or her right to a lawyer or right to silence or to waive these rights. The Supreme Court held that an individual intending to “articulate his desire to have counsel present” must express this “sufficiently clearly that a reasonable police officer in the circumstances would understand the statement to be a request for an attorney.” This same level of clarity is required for invoking the right to silence.

Waiver: Question First and Warn Later
The Supreme Court held that the issue when the police question first and warn later is whether “it would be reasonable to find that in these circumstances the warnings could function ‘effectively’ to advise the suspect that he or she “had a real choice about giving an admissible statement.”

Waiver Following Invocation of the Miranda Rights

A. The Supreme Court has held that the admissibility of statements obtained after a person in custody had decided to remain silent depends on whether his or her right to silence was scrupulously honored by the police.

B. An individual who invokes his or her right to an attorney may waive this right by initiating contact with the police.

Interrogation

In Rhode Island v. Innis, the Supreme Court defined interrogation. The Court explained that interrogation entails express questioning or the functional equivalent of direct questioning. Express questions are questions directed to a suspect by the police. The functional equivalents of direct questions are words or actions on the part of the police (other than those normally attendant to arrest and custody) that the police should know are reasonably likely to elicit an incriminating response from the suspect.

Sixth Amendment Right to Counsel: Police Interrogations

A. The Sixth Amendment is applicable to both federal and state governmental agents at or after the time that judicial proceedings have been initiated against an accused—whether by way of formal charge, preliminary hearing, indictment, information, or arraignment. The accused must also have requested or arranged for legal representation.

B. The Sixth Amendment prohibits the government from intentionally eliciting information from an accused. This prohibits interrogations and prohibits creating a situation likely to induce a defendant to make incriminating statements concerning a pending charge without the assistance of counsel. The suspect must voluntarily, knowingly, and intelligently relinquish his or her right to an attorney.

Introduction

Interrogations

The writings of the late Professor Fred Inbau of Northwestern University continue to have a significant influence on the tactics and strategy of police interrogations. Professor Inbau argued throughout his career that detective novels, films, and television had misled the public into believing that the police solve most crimes by relying on scientific evidence or eyewitness testimony. He pointed out that in a significant number of cases, this type of evidence is unavailable and that the police are forced to rely on confessions.

Professor Inbau illustrates the importance of confessions by pointing to the hypothetical example of discovering the dead body of a female who appears to have been the victim of a criminal assault. There is no indication of a forced entry into her home, and the police investigation fails to yield DNA, fingerprints, clothing fibers, or witnesses. Law enforcement officers question everyone who may have had a motive to kill the victim, including the victim’s angry former husband and her brother-in-law, who had accumulated large gambling debts and owed the victim money. The brother-in-law eventually tires under skillful police questioning and confesses. This example, according to Inbau, illustrates three important points concerning the importance of confessions (Inbau, 1961):

- Many criminal cases can be solved only through confessions or through information obtained from other individuals.
- Suspects often will not admit their guilt unless subjected to lengthy interrogations by the police.
- Successful police questioning requires sophisticated interrogation techniques that may be considered trickery or manipulative in ordinary police interactions with the public.

Inbau’s argument is nicely echoed by Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia’s remark that “even if I were to concede that an honest confession is a foolish mistake, I would welcome rather than reject it; a rule that foolish mistakes do not count would leave most offenders not only unconvicted but undetected” (Minnick v. Mississippi, 498 U.S. 146, 166–167 [1990]). It often is overlooked that in addition to speeding the conviction and punishment of the guilty, confessions can help to exonerate the innocent without subjecting these individuals to the time and expense of a lengthy criminal investigation and trial. There also is the practical consideration that the admission of criminal guilt is an important step in an offender’s acceptance of responsibility and commitment to rehabilitation (Dressler & Michaels, 2006, p. 418).

There is no reliable data that clearly establish the percentage of cases in which interrogations play a central role in establishing a defendant’s guilt. We can only note that jurors credit confessions with a great deal of importance in the determination of a defendant’s guilt or innocence. In summary, confessions play an important role in the criminal justice process for several reasons.

- Crime detection. Confessions help the police solve crimes where there is an absence of scientific evidence and witnesses.
- Accountability. Acknowledging guilt is a significant step toward rehabilitation.
- Efficiency. Confessions facilitate both criminal convictions of the guilty and exoneration of the innocent.

Confessions also present potential challenges and problems for the criminal justice system.

- Abuse. The police may be tempted to employ physical abuse and psychological coercion to extract confessions. Abusive conduct is encouraged by the practice of incom-municado police interrogation—the carrying out of interrogations in police stations without the presence of defense lawyers or judicial supervision.
- Fair procedures. A reliance on pretrial confessions to establish a suspect’s guilt is contrary to the principle that guilt is to be established beyond a reasonable doubt through the adversarial process in a courtroom.
- Reliability. There is the danger that a conviction will be based on a false confession.
- Inequality. Uneducated and disadvantaged suspects and individuals lacking self-confidence may be particularly vulnerable to manipulation and trickery. On the other hand, the wealthy and educated are more likely to possess the self-confidence and understanding to refuse to talk to the police and are more likely to be able to afford a lawyer.

The threat of false confessions and convictions has been of particular concern. This calls into question the adequacy of the protections that are made available to defendants in the criminal justice process and is pointed to by critics as illustrating the lack of fairness in the criminal justice process.

False Confessions

Individuals isolated in interrogation rooms have been known to make false confessions, even in instances in which the police did not pressure or manipulate suspects and treated suspects in a balanced and respectful fashion.

On April 19, 1989, a twenty-eight-year-old jogger was viciously attacked and raped in Central Park in New York City. Five African American and Latino teenagers ranging in age from fourteen to sixteen who had been arrested for muggings in the park that night confessed and the following year were convicted in two separate trials. Four of the five made videotaped statements with parents or relatives present. Typical was one young man’s description that “Raymond had her arms, and Steve had her legs. He spread it out. And Antron got on top, took her panties off.” A second confessed that “I grabbed one arm, some other kid grabbed one arm, and we grabbed her legs and stuff. Then we all took turns getting on her, getting on top of her.” One suspect went so far as to reenact how he pulled off her running pants.
The young men claimed in court that they had been pressured into the confessions. The jurors at the two trials nevertheless convicted the defendants. The massive publicity surrounding the case may have influenced the jurors to overlook the inconsistencies in the defendants’ accounts and to disregard the fact that only a few hairs on one of the defendants linked the juveniles to the rape. In 2002, Matia Reyes, who was serving over thirty years for murder and four rapes, confessed to the Central Park rape, and his DNA was found to match that of the perpetrator. On December 19, 2002, the convictions of the five men were overturned.

How is this possible? A number of factors in the Central Park Jogger case combined to create the danger of a false confession:

- Police bias. The police were under intense pressure to solve the crime and quickly concluded that the suspects must be guilty and focused on obtaining confessions.
- Age and intelligence. Several of the young suspects may have been tricked into confessing. Two had IQs below 90 and may have failed to understand the meaning of a confession.
- Misleading remarks and false evidence. Some of the young men claimed that they had been told that they would be permitted to go home if they confessed. One suspect reportedly was told that his fingerprints had been found at the crime scene, another was informed that the others had implicated him, and others were told that hairs linked one of the young men to the crime.
- Lengthy interrogations. The young men confessed after being interrogated for more than twenty-eight hours.

How frequent are false confessions? Professors Steve Drizen and Richard Leo have documented 125 proven false confessions between 1971 and 2002. The good news is that the criminal justice system responded by detecting two-thirds of these confessions prior to trial. On the other hand, forty-four of the defendants were sentenced to at least ten years in prison, and nine of these defendants were sentenced to death. This is not an overwhelming number of false convictions, but even a small number of false convictions are “too many” (Drizen & Leo, 2004). Psychologists tell us that there are three types of false confessors (Kassin & Gudjonsson, 2005):

- Voluntary false confessors. Suspects provide false confessions out of a desire for publicity or because they feel guilty about a past crime or are mentally challenged.
- Compliant false confessors. Suspects confess in order to obtain a benefit such as the avoidance of abuse or mistreatment or to receive favorable consideration at sentencing. This might range from a lighter sentence to imprisonment in an institution nearby to an offender’s family.
- Internalized false confessors. Suspects accept the police version of the facts or fail a lie detector test and come to believe that they actually committed the crime.

False confessions are a small percentage of all confessions obtained by the police. These confessions, however, may result in conviction of the innocent and undermine respect for the entire criminal justice system. Consider the case of Eddie Joe Lloyd, a resident of a mental institution, who contacted the police in 1984 with suggestions on how to solve the rape and murder of a sixteen-year-old Michigan girl. The police were convinced that Lloyd was the perpetrator and persuaded the heavily medicated Lloyd that if he confessed, this would lead the real killer to relax and lower his guard and would lead to the killer’s apprehension. The police allegedly fed Lloyd information to strengthen the credibility of his confession. Lloyd was pardoned in 2002 after spending seventeen years in prison when a DNA test indicated that he could not have been responsible for the crime.

In the United States, we believe that it is better for ten guilty people to go free than for an innocent individual to be criminally condemned. This is no mere academic concern. A conviction based on a false confession shakes confidence in the integrity of the criminal justice
Criminal Procedure

The judiciary has relied on three constitutional provisions to insure that confessions are the product of fair procedures.

Fourteenth Amendment Due Process Clause. As we have seen, there is a danger that the pressures of the interrogation process may lead to false confessions. The poor, uneducated, and mentally challenged are particularly vulnerable to trickery and manipulation. Former Supreme Court Justice Arthur Goldberg observed that history teaches that “a system of criminal law enforcement which comes to depend on the ‘confession’ will, in the long run, be less reliable and more subject to abuses than a system which depends on extrinsic evidence independently secured through skillful investigation” (Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478, 488–489 [1964]).

In the 1930s, the Supreme Court began to rely on the Fourteenth Amendment Due Process Clause to insure that confessions obtained by state law enforcement officials were voluntary and were not the product of psychological or physical abuse. The Due Process Clause provides that “[n]o state shall . . . deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law” and continues to be employed by courts to insure that confessions are voluntary. An involuntary confession violates an individual’s liberty to make a voluntary choice whether to confess and ultimately may lead to imprisonment and to a loss of liberty.

Fifth Amendment Self-Incrimination Clause. Herbert Packer notes that in the American accusatorial system of criminal procedure, the burden is on the prosecution to establish guilt beyond a reasonable doubt at trial, and the defendant may not be compelled to testify against himself or herself. This is distinguished from an inquisitorial system of criminal procedure in which the defendant does not enjoy the privilege against self-incrimination and must answer questions posed by the judge, who typically interrogates witnesses. The drafters of the U.S. Constitution were familiar with the English Star Chamber, a special court established by the English king in the fifteenth century that was charged with prosecuting and punishing political and religious dissidents. This inquisitorial tribunal employed torture and abuse to extract confessions and was authorized to hand out any punishment short of death. The reign of terror was effectively ended by Puritan John Lillburne who, in 1637, defied the chamber’s order that he confess to spreading dissident religious views. Lillburne was fined, pilloried, whipped, and imprisoned in leg irons in solitary confinement. Parliament ordered his release in 1640, and the House of Lords subsequently vacated Lillburne’s sentence, noting that it was “illegal…unjust…[and] against the liberty of the subject and law of the land” (Levy, 1968, pp. 272–291).

The right against self-incrimination was viewed as sufficiently important that eight of the original American states included provisions that no one may be “compelled to give witness against himself,” and the right against self-incrimination subsequently was included in the Fifth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

In 1966, in Miranda v. Arizona, the U.S. Supreme Court concluded that the inherently coercive environment of incommunicado police interrogation overwhelmed individuals’ ability to assert their right against self-incrimination. The Supreme Court responded by interpreting the Self-Incrimination Clause requirement that “[n]o person . . . shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself” to require the police to read individuals the Miranda rights prior to police interrogation (Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 [1966]).

The Supreme Court later held that the Sixth Amendment right to counsel protects individuals subjected to interrogation following the “initiation of proceedings against them.”

Sixth Amendment right to counsel. The U.S. Supreme Court supplemented the Miranda judgment in a series of cases that held that once the government has taken formal steps to prosecute an individual, he or she possesses a Sixth Amendment right to counsel. At this point, it is clear that the government is determined to prosecute, and the Supreme Court ruled that the police are prohibited by the Sixth Amendment from circumventing the trial process and establishing a suspect’s guilt through extrajudicial interrogation. The Court explained that the right to an attorney cannot be limited to the trial itself because the denial of access to a lawyer at this early stage of the prosecutorial process may seal the defendant’s fate and reduce the trial into a “mere formality” (Brewer v. Williams, 430 U.S. 387, 398 [1977]).

Your goal in this chapter should be to learn the strengths and weaknesses and differences between the three constitutional approaches to interrogations. Pay attention to the judiciary’s effort to strike a balance between the need for confessions and the rights of suspects. Consider whether the pendulum has swung too far toward law enforcement or has swung too far toward the protection of defendants or whether a proper balance has been struck. One final point: Keep three terms in mind as you read this chapter. The text, at times, uses these terms interchangeably, but they have distinct meanings.

Admissions. An individual admits a fact that tends to establish guilt, such as his or her presence at the shooting scene. An admission when combined with other facts may lead to a criminal conviction.

Confessions. An individual acknowledges the commission of a crime in response to police questioning or may voluntarily approach the police and admit to the crime.

Statements. An oral or written declaration to the police in which an individual may assert his or her innocence.

Due Process

The Voluntariness Test

Between 1936 and 1966, the U.S. Supreme Court held over thirty confessions obtained by state and local police unconstitutional and inadmissible at trial under the Fourteenth Amendment due process voluntariness test.

The voluntariness test can be traced to the English common law. Eighteenth-century English common law judges declared that confessions were inadmissible into evidence if they had been extracted through the threat or application of force, through a false promise not to prosecute, or through a promise of lenient treatment. Confessions obtained by a threat or promise of favorable treatment were thought to be unreliable and might result in the conviction of innocent individuals. There was no easy method to determine whether a confession was true or false, and English courts employed the shorthand test of asking whether the defendant’s statement was voluntary or involuntary (Rex v. Warickshall, 168 Eng. Rep. 234, 235 [K.B. 1783]).

In 1884, the U.S. Supreme Court adopted the English rule and announced that as a matter of the law of evidence, confessions were inadmissible in federal courts if obtained by police tactics that were sufficiently coercive such that the assumption that “one who is innocent will not imperil his safety or prejudice his interests by an untrue statement, ceases” (Hopt v. Utah, 110 U.S. 574 [1884]).

In 1897, the Supreme Court, in Bram v. United States, held that the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination provides the same protections as the English common law and that the Fifth Amendment prohibits the use of involuntary confessions against defendants. The holding in Bram was applicable only to the federal government because it was based on the Fifth Amendment, which the Supreme Court did not declare to be applicable to the states until 1964 in Malloy v. Hogan (Bram v. United States, 168 U.S. 532 [1897]).

State courts generally also followed the voluntariness test. There, however, was a significant gap between the law on the books and the law in practice. The Wickersham Commission established by President Herbert Hoover to investigate the administration of criminal justice in the United States reported in 1931 that there was widespread use of the third degree by the police to extract confessions.
The third degree is illustrated by Beecher v. Alabama, which was the subject of two decisions by the U.S. Supreme Court. Beecher was fleeing the Tennessee police across an open field when he was shot in the leg. The chief of police jammed a loaded pistol against Beecher’s face while another officer pointed a rifle at the side of Beecher’s head. The police chief threatened to kill Beecher, who was an African American, unless he confessed to the rape and murder of a “white woman.” The other officer then fired his rifle next to Beecher’s ear, and Beecher confessed. Beecher was taken to the hospital and received an injection to ease the pain that he was suffering as a result of most of the bone having been blown out of his leg. He then was instructed to sign extradition papers to Alabama or face a “white mob” that was determined to kill him. By the time Beecher arrived in Alabama five days later, his leg had become swollen, and he was in immense pain. He required morphine every four hours, and the leg ultimately was amputated. Two Alabama investigators interrogated Beecher in the prison hospital, and the medical assistant instructed him to cooperate with the authorities. Numb from the morphine, feverish, and in intense pain, Beecher signed two statements. The U.S. Supreme Court overturned Beecher’s confession and conviction (Beecher v. Alabama, 389 U.S. 35 [1967]). Three months later, Beecher was again prosecuted in Alabama, and an oral confession that he allegedly made to a doctor while under the influence of morphine in the Tennessee hospital was used as the basis for his conviction and death sentence. Should the Supreme Court affirm or reverse Beecher’s second conviction? The Supreme Court held that “realistic appraisal of the circumstances of this case compels the conclusion that this petitioner’s [confession was] the product of gross coercion. Under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, no conviction tainted by a confession so obtained can stand” (Beecher v. Alabama, 408 U.S. 234, 247 [1972]).

The U.S. Supreme Court’s condemnation of the third degree in Beecher was based on the precedents established in a series of Supreme Court decisions, beginning with Brown v. Mississippi in 1936.

Due Process and State Courts

The Supreme Court held in Brown v. Mississippi that the use of confessions at trial that have been obtained through physical coercion violate suspects’ fundamental rights and constitute a violation of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The Court explained that reliance on unreliable confessions creates the risk that innocent individuals will be condemned to lengthy terms of imprisonment or death (Brown v. Mississippi, 297 U.S. 278 [1936]).

In Brown, three African American males were convicted of murder in Mississippi solely based on their confessions. Defendant Ellington had been confronted by a deputy sheriff and by a mob of white men who accused him of murder. He denied the crime and was hanged by a rope from the limb of a tree, let down, and then strung up once again. Ellington continued to deny his guilt, and he was tied to a tree, whipped, and then released. He later was arrested and severely whipped while being transported to jail and, when threatened with additional beatings, signed a confession dictated by the sheriff. Defendants Brown and Shields also were arrested, stripped, and beaten with leather straps with inlaid metal buckles. Chief Justice of the U.S. Supreme Court Charles Evans Hughes observed that the trial transcript read “more like pages torn from some medieval account than a record made within the confines of a modern civilization which aspires to an enlightened and constitutional government” (282).

The Supreme Court, in reversing the defendants’ convictions, held that the Due Process Clause requires that the treatment of suspects “shall be consistent with the fundamental principles of liberty and justice which lie at the basis of all our civil and political institutions.” The Court observed that it would be difficult to conceive of methods “more revolting to the sense of justice than those taken to procure [these] confessions…. The rack and torture chamber may not be substituted for the witness stand” (316).

The Supreme Court in Brown concluded that Mississippi authorities had conspired to extract a coerced and untruthful confession. The Court’s decision was a clear message that the government bears the burden of establishing individuals’ guilt in the courtroom beyond a reasonable doubt and that government authorities may not coerce individuals into involuntarily providing evidence of their own guilt. The cost to the government of police tactics that violate the Due Process Clause is the exclusion of confessions from the prosecutor's case-in-chief at trial.

In 1944, in Ashcraft v. Tennessee, the Supreme Court extended the protection of the Due Process Clause to include psychological coercion. Ashcraft confessed to soliciting the murder of his wife after having been detained and subjected to incommunicado interrogation for thirty-six hours by teams of police officers and lawyers. The Supreme Court concluded that Ashcraft’s confession was the product of a coercive set of circumstances that overwhelmed his ability to exercise a rational choice and observed that the “efficiency of the rack and the thumbscrew” is now matched by equally effective techniques of psychological persuasion (Ashcraft v. Tennessee, 322 U.S. 143 [1944]). In Chambers v. Florida, the Supreme Court concluded that a group of young African Americans had been subjected to “protracted questioning…calculated to break the stoutest nerves and the strongest resistance….To permit human lives to be forfeited upon confessions thus obtained would make….due process….a meaningless symbol” (Chambers v. Florida, 309 U.S. 227, 238–240 [1948]).

The Supreme Court held that the confessions in Brown and Ashcraft were the product of police coercion and were in violation of the Due Process Clause. The Court’s application of the voluntariness test in these cases prevented innocent individuals from being convicted on the basis of coerced and false confessions. Reliable or trustworthy confessions are not the only goal of the voluntariness test. In Blackburn v. Alabama, the Supreme Court explained that the due process approach is designed to achieve a “complex of values” (Blackburn v. Alabama, 361 U.S.
199, 207 [1960]). We now briefly examine three interrelated goals in addition to trustworthiness that the Supreme Court identified as underlying the voluntariness test.

Fundamental Fairness

The Supreme Court pronounced in Lisenba v. California, in 1941, that the aim of the voluntariness test is not only to exclude false confessions but also to insure fundamental fairness in the methods used to obtain confessions. Justice Owen Roberts noted that it would be contrary to due process to employ threats, promises, or torture in the courtroom to induce an individual to testify against himself and a “case can stand no better if, by resort to the same means, the defendant is induced to confess and his confession is given in evidence” (Lisenba
v. California, 314 U.S. 219 [1941]). This type of abusive behavior, according to Justice Roberts, undermines respect for the criminal justice system.

Police Methods

The police methods test is based on “deep-rooted feeling that the police must obey the law while enforcing the law…in the end life and liberty can be as much endangered from illegal methods used to convict those thought to be criminals as from the actual criminals themselves” (Spano v. New York, 360 U.S. 315, 320–321 [1959]).

This approach was first articulated in Watts v. Indiana in 1949. In Watts, the police interrogated Watts for five consecutive evenings and deprived him of sufficient sleep and food.
Watts also was not taken before a judge for a formal charge and was not advised of his constitutional rights, as required under Indiana law. The U.S. Supreme Court ruled that Watts’s confession was unconstitutionally obtained and held that the Due Process Clause “bars police procedures which violate the basic notions of our accusatorial mode of prosecuting crime…[and stressed that] brutal methods of law enforcement are essentially self-defeating, whatever may be their effect in a particular case” (Watts v. Indiana, 338 U.S. 49, 54 [1949]).

Involuntary Confessions

A fourth purpose behind the due process approach is the exclusion of involuntary confessions that result from mental disabilities or drugs administered by the police and are not the product of a rational intellect and free will. In Townsend v. Sain, defendant Charles Townsend was arrested in connection with a robbery and murder. The nineteen-year-old Townsend had been addicted to narcotics since age fifteen and was under the influence of heroin at the time of his arrest. Townsend complained during his interrogation that he was suffering from withdrawal and asked for a dose of narcotics. A doctor injected Townsend with a combination of phenobarbital and hyoscine. This alleviated Townsend’s symptoms, and he agreed to talk to the police, confessed within twenty-five minutes, and signed a statement the next day. Townsend soon thereafter experienced additional discomfort, and he was given a tablet of phenobarbital and again confessed several hours later (Townsend v. Sain, 372 U.S. 293 [1963]).

Following Townsend’s conviction, it was revealed that the police were unaware that hyoscine possessed the property of truth serum and that the combination of the drugs administered to Townsend adversely affected his ability to think clearly. The U.S. Supreme Court ruled that “[i]t is difficult to imagine a situation in which a confession would be less the product of a free intellect, less voluntary, than when brought about by a drug having the effect of truth serum.... Any questioning by police offices which in fact produces a confession which is not the product of a free intellect renders the confession inadmissible” (308–309).

The Four Purposes of the Voluntariness Test

In summary, the due process voluntariness test is designed to achieve four interrelated purposes.

Trustworthiness. Confessions that result from physical or psychological coercion run the risk that a defendant confessed to avoid or to halt abuse. Statements made under such threat are unreliable and may be false. In Payne v. Arkansas, a nineteen-year-old African American defendant accused of murder was subjected to incommunicado interrogation for three days and confessed following the sheriff’s threat to turn him over to a white mob. The Supreme Court ruled that the confession was “coerced and did not constitute an ‘expression of free choice’” (Payne v. Arkansas, 356 U.S. 560, 567 [1958]).

Fundamental fairness. The use of an involuntary confession against a defendant is fundamentally unfair and compromises the integrity of the courtroom. In White v. Texas, White, an illiterate African American farmhand, was illegally detained and taken to the home of the brother-in-law of a rape victim. There, he found fifteen or sixteen other African American suspects who also were being illegally detained without charge or access to a lawyer. White then was taken to the jail where he was detained for six or seven days and was removed at night, taken to the woods, and interrogated. He ultimately signed a confession after having been interrogated most of the night. The Supreme Court ruled that due process prohibits condemning an accused to death through such practices (White v. Texas, 310 U.S. 530 [1940]).

Offensive police methods. Confessions are in violation of the Due Process Clause are the product of police tactics that are offensive to fundamental values. In Lynumn v. Illinois, the defendant confessed after three police officers threatened that she would lose her children unless she cooperated and signed a confession. The Supreme Court observed that isolated and inexperienced defendants had “no reason not to believe that the police had ample power to carry out their threats” (Lynumn v. Illinois, 372 U.S. 528, 534 [1963]).

Free will and rational choice. Confessions violate due process if they are the product of drugs administered by the police or of a suspect’s psychological disabilities and if they do not result from free will or rational choice. In Blackburn v. Alabama, a “mentally incompetent” defendant confessed after having been interrogated for eight or nine hours in a small room filled with police officers. Shortly thereafter, he was evaluated as legally insane. Four years later, Blackburn was declared mentally competent and was prosecuted and convicted of robbery. The Supreme Court held that the chance of Blackburn’s four-year-old confession having been the product of “rational choice and free will” was “remote” and that the confession’s introduction into evidence was a flagrant abuse of due process (Blackburn v. Alabama, 361 U.S. 199, 208 [1960]).
The voluntariness test is based on the controversial proposition that an involuntary confession should be excluded from evidence, regardless of whether the confession is true or false. We outline in the next section the factors considered by judges in determining whether a confession is voluntary or is the product of coercion.

Voluntariness

The Supreme Court has held that to be admissible into evidence, a confession must have been made freely, voluntarily, and without compulsion or inducement of any sort. A confession violates due process and is excluded from evidence that involves the following:

- Coercion. The police or government officials subject the defendant to physical or psychological coercion.
- Will to resist. The coercion overcomes the will of an individual to resist.

We have seen examples of coercive conduct in the cases discussed in this section. How do courts determine whether there was coercion and whether the coercion overcame a defendant’s will to resist? The determination as to whether a confession is involuntary is based on the totality of the circumstances surrounding a confession (Haynes v. Washington, 373 U.S. 503, 533–534 [1963]). The prosecution bears the burden of establishing voluntariness by a “preponderance of the evidence” (Lego v. Twomey, 404 U.S. 477 [1972]). In evaluating the totality of the circumstances, courts consider a number of factors.

- Physical abuse. Physical abuse and threats of abuse by the police or angry crowds.
- Psychological abuse and manipulation. Threats, rewards, or trickery inducing a suspect to confess.
- Interrogation. The length, time, and place of questioning and the number of police officers involved.
- Attorney. A refusal to permit a suspect to consult with an attorney, friends, or family.
- Defendant. The age, education, and mental and emotional development of the defendant.
- Procedural regularity. A failure by the police to follow proper legal procedures, including the Miranda warning.
- Necessity. The police are provided greater flexibility in interrogation when attempting to solve a crime or exonerate a defendant than when they already possess evidence of a defendant’s guilt.

Spano v. New York illustrates the totality-of-the-circumstances approach to determining whether a confession is voluntary or involuntary. In Spano, the U.S. Supreme Court held that the defendant’s “will was overborne by official pressure, fatigue and sympathy falsely aroused.” The Court’s conclusion was based on a number of factors (Spano v. New York, 360 U.S. 315, 323 [1959]):

- Psychological abuse. The police employed a childhood friend to play on the defendant’s sympathy.
- Interrogation. The defendant was questioned for eight hours at night by fourteen officers, and his confession was written down by a skilled and aggressive prosecutor.
- Attorney. The police disregarded the defendant’s refusal to speak on the advice of counsel and ignored his request to contact his lawyer.
Defendant. The defendant was twenty-five years of age and never before had been subjected to custodial arrest or to police interrogation. He had not completed high school and had a psychological disability.

Procedural regularity. The police failed to immediately bring the defendant before a judge and instead subjected him to interrogation.

Necessity. The police already possessed eyewitnesses to the shooting and were engaged in securing the evidence required to convict the defendant rather than in identifying the individual responsible for the crime.

Criminal Procedure

Criticism of the Due Process Test

The due process test is subject to several criticisms.

Standards. There are no clear guidelines for the police concerning what conduct is permissible and what conduct is impermissible.

Evidence. The defendant and the police may offer radically different versions of the defendant’s treatment during the interrogation. Judges find it difficult to reconstruct what actually occurred.

Litigation. The lack of definite standards encourages legal appeals and increases the caseloads of state and federal courts.

The Due Process Test Today

Keep in mind as you continue to read this chapter that an involuntary confession violates due process of law and is inadmissible into evidence, even in those instances in which a defendant may have been read his or her Miranda rights. Two recent cases illustrate the U.S. Supreme Court’s continuing reliance on the due process, voluntariness test:

Mincey v. Arizona. Mincey, while in intensive care in the hospital, was interrogated by a police detective who informed him that he was under arrest for murder. Mincey’s requests for a lawyer were disregarded, and the detective continued the interrogation. The suspect was unable to talk because of a tube in his mouth and responded by writing down his answers. The Supreme Court determined that Mincey was “weakened by pain and shock, isolated from family, friends, and legal counsel, and barely conscious, and his will was simply overborne” and that his confession had been obtained in violation of due process of law. The Court stressed that an involuntary confession may not be used at trial for any purpose whatsoever (Mincey v. Arizona, 437 U.S. 385, 401–402 [1978]).

Arizona v. Fulminante. Fulminante was incarcerated on federal firearms charges and established a friendship with Sarivola, a paid federal informant who was serving a sixty-day sentence for extortion and posing as an organized crime figure. Sarivola was instructed to obtain information regarding Fulminante’s possible involvement in the murder of his young daughter. Sarivola offered to protect Fulminante from the other inmates who allegedly disliked “child killers” on the condition that Fulminante tell him what happened to his daughter. Fulminante admitted sexually assaulting and shooting his daughter in the head. Sarivola later testified at Fulminante’s murder trial. The Supreme Court examined the totality of circumstances and concluded that the confession was involuntary. The Court reasoned that Fulminante was a child murderer whose fear of physical retaliation led him to confide in Sarivola. Fulminante, according to the Court, felt particularly susceptible to physical retaliation because he possessed a slight build and, while previously incarcerated, could not cope with the pressures of imprisonment and in the past had been admitted to a psychiatric institution (Arizona v. Fulminante, 499 U.S. 279 [1991]).

In the next case in the text, Colorado v. Connelly, the U.S. Supreme Court addresses whether the prosecution’s use of a confession against a defendant who claimed to have been directed by God to confess constitutes a violation of the Due Process Clause. Do you agree with the decision in Connelly?
Facts
On August 18, 1983, Officer Patrick Anderson of the Denver Police Department was in uniform, working in an off-duty capacity in downtown Denver. Respondent Francis Connelly approached Officer Anderson and, without any prompting, stated that he had murdered someone and wanted to talk about it. Understandably bewildered by this confession, Officer Anderson asked respondent several questions. Connelly denied that he had been drinking, denied that he had been taking any drugs, and stated that, in the past, he had been a patient in several mental hospitals. Officer Anderson again told Connelly that he was under no obligation to say anything. Connelly replied that it was “all right,” and that he would talk to Officer Anderson because his conscience had been bothering him. To Officer Anderson, respondent appeared to understand fully the nature of his acts.

Shortly thereafter, Homicide Detective Stephen Antuna arrived. Connelly was again advised of his rights and Detective Antuna asked him “what he had on his mind.” Respondent answered that he had come all the way from Boston to confess to the murder of Mary Ann Junta, a young girl whom he had killed in Denver sometime during November 1982. Respondent was taken to police headquarters, and a search of police records revealed that the body of an unidentified female had been found in April 1983. Respondent openly detailed his story to Detective Antuna and Sergeant Thomas Haney, and readily agreed to take the officers to the scene of the killing. Under Connelly’s sole direction, the two officers and respondent proceeded in a police vehicle to the location of the crime. Respondent pointed out the exact location of the murder. Throughout this episode, Detective Antuna perceived no indication whatsoever that respondent was suffering from any kind of mental illness.

Respondent was held overnight. During an interview with the public defender’s office the following morning, he became visibly disoriented. He began giving confused answers to questions, and for the first time, stated that “voices” had told him to come to Denver and that he had followed the directions of these voices in confessing. Respondent was sent to a state hospital for evaluation. He was initially found incompetent to assist in his own defense. By March 1984, however, the doctors evaluating respondent determined that he was competent to proceed to trial. At a preliminary hearing, respondent moved to suppress all of his statements. Dr. Jeffrey Metzner, a psychiatrist employed by the state hospital, testified that respondent was suffering from chronic schizophrenia and was in a psychotic state at least as of August 17, 1983, the day before he confessed. Metzner’s interviews with respondent revealed that respondent was following the “voice of God.” This voice instructed respondent to withdraw money from the bank, to buy an airplane ticket, and to fly from Boston to Denver. When respondent arrived from Boston, God’s voice became stronger and told respondent either to confess to the killing or to commit suicide. Reluctantly following the command of the voices, respondent approached Officer Anderson and confessed.

Dr. Metzner testified that, in his expert opinion, respondent was experiencing “command hallucinations.” This condition interfered with respondent’s “volitional abilities; that is, his ability to make free and rational choices.” Dr. Metzner further testified that Connelly’s illness did not significantly impair his cognitive abilities. Thus, respondent understood the rights he had when Officer Anderson and Detective Antuna advised him that he need not speak. Dr. Metzner admitted that the “voices” could in reality be Connelly’s interpretation of his own guilt, but explained that in his opinion, Connelly’s psychosis motivated his confession.

Issue

On the basis of this evidence, the Colorado trial court decided that respondent’s statements must be suppressed because they were “involuntary.” The court ruled that a confession is admissible only if it is a product of the defendant’s rational intellect and “free will.” Although the court found that the police had done nothing wrong or coercive in securing respondent’s confession, Connelly’s illness destroyed his volition and compelled him to confess. Accordingly, respondent’s initial statements and his custodial confession were suppressed. The Colorado Supreme Court affirmed. In that court’s view, the proper test for admissibility is whether the statements are “the product of a rational intellect and a free will.” Indeed, “the absence of police coercion or duress does not foreclose a finding of involuntariness. One’s capacity for rational judgment and free choice may be overborne as much by certain forms of severe mental illness as by external pressure.”

Reasoning

The cases considered by this Court over the fifty years since Brown v. Mississippi have focused upon the crucial element of police overreaching. While each confession case has turned on its own set of factors justifying the conclusion that police conduct was oppressive, all have contained a substantial element of coercive police conduct. Absent police conduct causally related to the confession, there is simply no basis for concluding that any state actor has deprived a criminal defendant of due process of law. Respondent correctly notes that as interrogators have turned to more subtle forms of psychological persuasion, courts have found the mental condition of the defendant a more significant factor in the “voluntariness” calculus. But this fact does not justify a conclusion that a defendant’s mental condition, by itself and apart from its relation to official coercion, should ever dispose of the inquiry into constitutional “voluntariness.”

The difficulty with the approach of the Supreme Court of Colorado is that it fails to recognize the essential link between coercive activity of the State, on the one hand, and a resulting confession by a defendant, on the other. The flaw in respondent’s constitutional argument is that it would expand our previous line of “voluntariness” cases into a far-ranging requirement that courts must divine a defendant’s motivation for speaking or acting as he did even though there be no claim that governmental conduct coerced his decision. The most outrageous behavior by a private party seeking to secure evidence against a defendant does not make that evidence inadmissible under the Due Process Clause. The purpose of excluding evidence seized in violation of the Constitution is to substantially deter future violations of the Constitution. Only if we were to establish a brand new constitutional right—the right of a criminal defendant to confess to his crime only when totally rational and properly motivated—could respondent’s present claim be sustained. A statement rendered by one in the condition of respondent might be proved to be quite unreliable, but this is a matter to be governed by the evidentiary laws of the forum.

Holding

We hold that coercive police activity is a necessary predicate to the finding that a confession is not “voluntary” within the meaning of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. We also conclude that the taking of respondent’s statements and their admission into evidence constitute no violation of that clause.
The police justifiably complained that the due process test left them with limited guidance. How many police could interrogate a defendant? For how long? Could they advise a defendant that they already possessed some evidence suggesting that he or she was guilty? Were they required to allow a defendant to consult with an attorney? Defendants who felt that their confessions had been coerced were forced to spend time and money appealing the introduction of their confessions at trial.

The U.S. Supreme Court responded by attempting to develop clearer guidelines for the police. In McNabb v. United States and Mallory v. United States, the Court required federal law enforcement officials to immediately bring suspects before a judicial officer. Confessions obtained in violation of this rule were inadmissible in federal court. This “bright-line” rule for the admissibility of confessions ultimately failed to make a significant impact on police practices. In 1943, in McNabb, three residents of the mountains of Appalachia were convicted of murdering a federal revenue agent who was investigating the McNabb family’s rumored illegal whiskey operation. The defendants were arrested at night, incarcerated in a barren cell, and questioned continually over the course of two days without being brought before a court to determine whether the evidence justified their detention. The defendants appealed on the grounds that the confessions had been obtained in violation of their Fifth Amendment rights (McNabb v. United States, 318 U.S. 332 [1943]).

The Supreme Court relied on its inherent supervisory authority over the federal courts to reverse the defendants’ convictions. The Court pointed out that existing congressional statutes explicitly required federal officers to immediately bring arrestees before a magistrate or judge and demonstrate a legal justification for the arrest. Justice Felix Frankfurter held that the defendants’ confessions had been secured through “flagrant disregard” of the law and that their convictions “cannot be allowed to stand without making the courts themselves accomplices in willful disobedience to the law.” Congress had not explicitly prohibited the introduction into evidence of confessions obtained without first taking defendants before a federal official, but the failure to exclude such statements from evidence would stultify the policy established by Congress (345).

In 1957, in Mallory v. United States, the Supreme Court affirmed the decision in McNabb. The Court, however, based its decision on Rule 5(a) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, adopted three years following McNabb. Rule 5(a) is binding on federal courts and requires that federal officers making an arrest shall “take the arrested person without unnecessary delay before the nearest available commissioner or before any other nearby officer empowered to commit persons charged with offenses against the laws of the United States.” Mallory’s confession to a rape charge was obtained after nearly eight hours of interrogation, and only then was he formally charged before a judge. The Supreme Court threw out Mallory’s confession and explained that the police may not arrest and interrogate a defendant and then decide whether there is probable cause to charge him or her with a crime (Mallory v. United States, 345 U.S. 449 [1943]).

The McNabb–Mallory rule focused on the length of delay between an arrest and a suspect’s initial appearance before a magistrate. This differed from the due process test that examined whether the totality of the circumstances indicated that a confession had been coerced. Critics of McNabb–Mallory objected that the Supreme Court was impeding the conviction of criminals and argued that there was no reason to exclude a voluntary confession merely because the confession had been obtained without promptly presenting a defendant before a federal magistrate. Congress responded by passing the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968, which specifies that a voluntary confession “shall not be inadmissible solely because of delay” in bringing an individual before a judicial official “if such confession was made or given by such person within six hours immediately following his arrest or other detention.” The six-hour limitation “shall not apply in any case in which the delay…is found…to be reasonable considering the means of transportation and the distance to be traveled to the nearest available such magistrate or other officer” (18 U.S.C. § 3501(a), (b)).

The McNabb–Mallory decisions today are of greater historical than practical significance. Federal courts generally consider unreasonable delay to be one of several factors to be considered in evaluating the voluntariness of a defendant’s confession. The U.S. Supreme Court has now clarified that § 3501 is not required to be followed by the U.S. Constitution and is not applicable to the states (United States v. Alvarez-Sanchez, 511 U.S. 350 [1994]). Most state courts, in any event, have refused to follow the McNabb–Mallory approach and merely view the failure to present a detainee for arraignment to be one of many factors to be considered in evaluating whether the totality of the circumstances indicate that a confession was coerced.

Escobedo v. Illinois

In 1964, in Escobedo v. Illinois, the U.S. Supreme Court took an additional step to clarify police procedures and to protect suspects when it extended the Sixth Amendment right to counsel to individuals subjected to police interrogation by state as well as federal law enforcement officers.

There were indications in several of the earlier cases decided under the Due Process Clause that four members of the Supreme Court viewed access to a lawyer as fundamental to protecting defendants during police interrogation. These justices, although they were unable to attract an additional vote to constitute a majority, would have excluded confessions from evidence in cases in which the police refused to provide a defendant access to a lawyer. Justice William Douglas observed in Spano v. New York that the failure to extend the right to a lawyer to pretrial interrogation meant that the “secret trial in the police precincts effectively supplants the public trial guaranteed by the Bill of Rights” (Spano v. New York, 360 U.S. 315, 326 [1959]).

Consider two examples of the division between the Supreme Court judges on whether a denial of access to an attorney was a violation of due process that should result in the exclusion of a confession from the prosecution’s case-in-chief.

Crooker v. California. The petitioner confessed to murdering his lover and appealed that although he had voluntarily confessed, the police had denied him due process by rejecting his request for a lawyer. A majority of the Supreme Court held that requiring that defendants be provided access to an attorney would have a “devastating effect” on interrogations because the impact would be to “preclude police questioning…until the accused was afforded opportunity to call his attorney.” Four judges dissented on the grounds that access to an attorney during pretrial interrogation following an arrest was essential to the protection of a defendant’s right at trial (Crooker v. California, 357 U.S. 433 [1958]).

Cicenia v. La Gay. Cicenia’s lawyer appeared at the police station and was denied access to Cicenia. Cicenia subsequently asked and was denied the opportunity to meet with his lawyer while being questioned by the police. The U.S. Supreme Court affirmed the petitioner’s murder conviction and rejected the argument that due process required that local law enforcement officers inform suspects of their constitutional right to confer with an attorney. The dissenting judges, once again, argued for recognition of the due process right of access to a lawyer during pretrial interrogation following an arrest was essential to the protection of a defendant’s right at trial (Cicenia v. La Gay, 357 U.S. 504 [1958]).

Massiah v. United States. Massiah was the breakthrough decision that extended the Sixth Amendment right to an attorney to individuals subjected to pretrial interrogation. Massiah and Colson were indicted for violating federal narcotics laws and were released on bail. Colson was persuaded to cooperate with the government and agreed to the installation of a radio transmitter under the front seat of his automobile. He engaged Massiah in a conversation, and at trial, an FBI agent testified regarding the conversation that he had overheard. Justice Potter Stewart held that after Massiah had been indicted and was entitled to a lawyer and to the determination of his guilt before a judge and jury, he had been improperly subjected to an extrajudicial, police-orchestrated proceeding designed to obtain incriminating statements (Massiah v. United States, 377 U.S. 201 [1964]).

Massiah provided the foundation for the Supreme Court decision in Escobedo v. Illinois. The petitioner, Danny Escobedo, a twenty-two-year-old Hispanic, was arrested for the murder of his brother-in-law. Escobedo was interrogated for fifteen hours, refused to make a statement, and was released on the order of a court. He was rearrested eleven days later, and on the way to police headquarters, Escobedo was told by the police that he had been named by DiGerlando, a suspected accomplice, as “[t]he one who shot” the deceased. Escobedo responded by requesting permission to consult with his lawyer (Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478 [1964]).

During Escobedo’s interrogation by the police, he repeatedly asked and was denied permission to speak with his lawyer, who he was told “didn’t want to see him.” In fact, Escobedo’s lawyer appeared shortly after Escobedo’s arrival at the police headquarters and was denied access to his client. At one point, Escobedo and his lawyer came into eye contact with one another. The police confronted Escobedo, who was handcuffed, kept standing, nervous, and suffering from a lack of sleep, with DiGerlando. Escobedo responded by exclaiming, “I didn’t shoot Manuel, you did it.” Escobedo then made a series of incriminating remarks, implicating himself in the crime. The Supreme Court of Illinois determined that the refusal to permit Escobedo to see his lawyer did not change the fact that he voluntarily confessed to the murder.
Justice Arthur Goldberg wrote the opinion for the U.S. Supreme Court and held that Escobedo was entitled to be informed of his right to silence and counsel under the Sixth Amendment to the Constitution. As a result, his statement had been unconstitutionally obtained and had been improperly introduced by the prosecution at trial.

The significance of Escobedo is that the decision extended the Sixth Amendment right to a lawyer established in Massiah to the period prior to indictment. Justice Goldberg reasoned that this was the point at which most confessions were elicited, and a failure to provide access to an attorney at this stage would render legal representation at trial meaningless. Goldberg recognized that any competent lawyer would undoubtedly instruct his or her client not to talk to the police and that affording defendants the right to counsel prior to their formal indictment likely would impede interrogations and prevent the police from gathering the required evidence to prosecute crimes. Justice Goldberg nevertheless explained that the Constitution strikes a balance in favor of the accused’s right against self-incrimination when weighed against the interests of society in eliciting a confession. Goldberg went on to observe that history teaches that a criminal justice system that “comes to depend on the ‘confession’ will, in the long run, be less reliable and more subject to abuses than a system which depends on extrinsic evidence independently secured through skillful investigation” (489).

Escobedo was based on the belief that informing defendants of their right to silence and of their right to the presence of a lawyer would protect suspects against uninformed and involuntary confessions. An attorney undoubtedly would have advised Escobedo that admitting his complicity in the murder would result in criminal liability for the killing.

Two years later, in Miranda v. Arizona, the Supreme Court abandoned the Sixth Amendment analysis and extended the Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination to the interrogation of criminal suspects. The Supreme Court would later look back on Escobedo and observe that the decision set the stage for Miranda. In 1972, in Kirby v. Illinois, Justice Louis Powell explained that the underlying impact of Escobedo was “not to vindicate the constitutional right to counsel as such, but, like Miranda, to guarantee full effectuation of the privilege against self-incrimination” (Kirby v. Illinois, 406 U.S. 682, 689 [1972]). Miranda v. Arizona was the next step in the comprehensive constitutional regulation of police interrogations. We first need to understand the Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination.

The Right Against Self-Incrimination

The Self-Incrimination Clause of the Fifth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution provides that “[n]o person…shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself.” This constitutional right was extended to the states in Malloy v. Hogan in which the U.S. Supreme Court held that the Fifth Amendment’s prohibition on compulsory self-incrimination is incorporated into the Fourteenth Amendment and is applicable against the states. Justice William Brennan observed that the state and federal governments are “constitutionally compelled to establish guilt by evidence independently and freely secured, and may not, by coercion prove a charge against an accused out of his own mouth” (Malloy v. Hogan, 378 U.S. 1, 6 [1964]).

In other words, you do not have to answer questions that may tend to incriminate you, and your failure to respond cannot be used against you in a criminal proceeding. Why do we have a right that works to the advantage of guilty individuals by allowing them to withhold evidence from prosecuting authorities? This right was a reaction to procedures in religious courts and in the politically repressive Star Chamber in sixteenth-century England. These tribunals placed the burden on individuals to answer questions and to prove that they were not heretics or political dissidents. Justice Arthur Goldberg provided several reasons for the right against self-incrimination, a right that he stated “reflects many of our fundamental values and most noble aspirations” (Murphy v. Waterfront Commission, 378 U.S. 52, 55 [1964]). In considering these points, ask yourself whether we should have a right against self-incrimination.

• Cruel trilemma. Individuals should not be compelled to choose between “self-accusation, perjury or contempt.” The law, in other words, should not place an individual in the position of making the unhappy choice between admitting guilt or...
denying guilt and facing a perjury charge for false testimony or refusing to speak and being held in contempt of court for failing to cooperate with the judicial process.

- Coercion. The fear that coercion and force will be used to compel individuals to incriminate themselves.

- Adversarial system. We have an adversarial rather than inquisitorial legal system. The accused is not required to establish his or her innocence; the State has the burden of proving guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.

- Privacy. An individual should not be forced to disclose information to the government.

Information is incriminating if there is a “substantial” and “real” threat that the information may lead to a criminal charge or establish a link in the chain of evidence that may result in a criminal prosecution. The U.S. Supreme Court recently dismissed a defendant’s challenge to a “stop-and-identify” statute on the grounds that the defendant did not possess “any articulated real and appreciable fear that his name would be used to incriminate him, or that it ‘would furnish a link in the chain of evidence needed to prosecute’ him….Answer[ing] a request to disclose a name is likely to be so insignificant…as to be incriminating only in unusual circumstances” (Hiibel v. Sixth Judicial Court, 542 U.S. 177 [2004]).

The second point to remember is that the privilege against self-incrimination is violated when the incriminating information is used against an individual in a legal proceeding. In Chavez v. Martinez, the defendant was shot by a police officer and was questioned by the officer while he was in intense pain in a hospital. Chavez admitted during the interrogation that he had taken the officer’s pistol from his holster and pointed the weapon at him. Chavez filed a civil action for damages against the officer for violating his right against self-incrimination. The Supreme Court ruled that Martinez was never made a “witness” against himself because his statements were never admitted as testimony against him in a criminal case. Nor was he ever placed under oath and exposed to “‘the cruel trilemma of self-accusation, perjury or contempt’” (Chavez v. Martinez, 538 U.S. 760 [2003]).

The third point is that the requirement that you may not be compelled to be a witness against yourself is satisfied when you are required to answer questions asked by the government. In Hoffman v. United States, the Supreme Court upheld the right of an organized crime figure to refuse to answer questions regarding his employment and associates before a grand jury investigating frauds perpetrated against the government. The Supreme Court observed that the “immediate and potential evils of compulsory self-disclosure transcend any difficulties that the exercise of the privilege may impose on society in the detection and prosecution of crime” (Hoffman v. United States, 341 U.S. 479, 485 [1951]). On the other hand, there is no compulsion when a driver arrested for drunk driving is offered the choice of either submitting to a simple and relatively painless blood-alcohol test or having his or her refusal to do so used against him or her in court (South Dakota v. Neville, 459 U.S. 553 [1983]).

Finally, the prohibition against being compelled to be a witness against oneself is limited to testimonial evidence, or evidence that is communicative in character. What does this mean? The Supreme Court explained the testimonial or communicative requirement in Doe v. United States. The Court stated that the government is prohibited from compelling you to make a factual statement, forcing you to disclose information that connects you to a criminal offense, or requiring you to share your private thoughts or beliefs with the government. The Supreme Court has noted that the privilege against self-incrimination encompasses trial testimony, oral confessions to the police, and personal documents. On the other hand, there is no privilege against self-incrimination where the government compels you to provide nontestimonial evidence. Judges have held that nontestimonial evidence includes voice and handwriting exemplars, fingerprints, participation in a lineup, the police requiring you to try on clothes or to walk in a straight line, hair and urine samples, the withdrawing of blood, the examination of scars and tattoos, and the taking of photos. This evidence may be used against you in a criminal proceeding, and your failure to cooperate in these procedures may be introduced at trial to establish your guilt. You also will be held in contempt of court if you refuse to provide this type of physical or nontestimonial evidence (Doe v. United States, 487 U.S. 201 [1988]).

You no doubt have a puzzled look on your face because the line between testimonial or communicative and nontestimonial or physical evidence does not appear to be crystal clear.
You are correct. Consider Pennsylvania v. Muniz. Muniz was arrested for driving while intoxicated. He was taken to a “booking center,” and his subsequent interrogation by the police was recorded. Muniz was first asked his name, address, height, weight, eye color, date of birth, and current age. His response was slow and slurred. These questions asked for routine information and were not incriminating. The police officer then asked Muniz whether he knew the date of his sixth birthday. Muniz replied, “No, I don’t.”

Was Muniz’s answer to the sixth-birthday question admissible in evidence? The Supreme Court held in a 5-to-4 ruling that this question called for a testimonial response that violated Muniz’s right against self-incrimination and that his response was inadmissible in evidence. The question confronted Muniz with the unhappy situation of choosing either self-incrimination or perjury. Muniz, according to Justice Brennan, either could admit that he did not know the date of his sixth birthday or could answer untruthfully and report a date of birth that he knew was inaccurate. His answer in either case would indicate that Muniz’s mental state was impaired by alcohol. The Supreme Court majority reasoned that either alternative would be the equivalent of Muniz’s admitting that he was too intoxicated to answer the question accurately.

Eight justices also held for different reasons that Muniz’s slurred speech in answering the booking questions was admissible to establish that he was inebriated. Four of these justices explained that Muniz’s slurred speech was nontestimonial and demonstrated Muniz’s lack of “muscular coordination” in forming his words and that this related to Muniz’s physical act of speaking rather than to the words that he was speaking. As a result, the slurred speech was nontestimonial rather than testimonial evidence, did not violate Muniz’s right against self-incrimination, and was properly introduced into evidence. Is this distinction persuasive? (Pennsylvania v. Muniz, 496 U.S. 582 [1990]).

The next case in the text, Schmerber v. California, asks you to decide whether the courts’ distinction between testimonial and nontestimonial evidence makes sense.

Legal Equation

Privilege against self-incrimination = Compulsion + Criminal case

+ Witness against yourself + Reveal testimonial evidence.

Did the involuntary withdrawal of the petitioner's blood violate his right against self-incrimination?

Schmerber v. California, 384 U.S. 757 (1966), Brennan, J.

Facts

Petitioner was convicted in Los Angeles Municipal Court of the criminal offense of driving an automobile while under the influence of intoxicating liquor.

Petitioner and a companion had been drinking at a tavern and bowling alley. There was evidence showing that petitioner was driving from the bowling alley about midnight November 12, 1964, when the car skidded, crossed the road, and struck a tree. Both petitioner and his companion were injured and taken to a hospital for treatment. He had been arrested at a hospital while receiving treatment for injuries suffered in an accident involving the automobile that he had apparently been driving. At the direction of a police officer, a blood sample was then withdrawn from petitioner’s body by a physician at the hospital. The chemical analysis of this sample revealed a percent by weight of alcohol in his blood at the time of the offense which indicated intoxication, and the report of this analysis was admitted in evidence at the trial. Petitioner objected to receipt of this evidence of the analysis on the ground that the blood had been withdrawn despite his refusal, on the advice of his counsel, to consent to the test. He contended that in that circumstance, the withdrawal of the blood and the admission of the analysis in evidence denied him due process of law under the Fourteenth Amendment, as well as specific guarantees of the Bill of Rights secured against the States by that Amendment: his privilege against self-incrimination under the Fifth Amendment; his right to counsel under the Sixth Amendment; and his right not to be subjected to unreasonable searches and seizures in violation of the Fourth Amendment. The Appellate Department of the California Superior Court rejected these contentions and affirmed the conviction…. We affirm.

Issue

_Malloy v. Hogan…_ held that the Fourteenth Amendment secures against state invasion the same privilege that the Fifth Amendment guarantees against federal infringement—the right of a person to remain silent unless he chooses to speak in the unfettered exercise of his own will, and to suffer no penalty …for such silence. We therefore must now decide whether the withdrawal of the blood and admission in evidence of the analysis involved in this case violated petitioner’s privilege.

Reasoning

It could not be denied that in requiring petitioner to submit to the withdrawal and chemical analysis of his blood, the State compelled him to submit to an attempt to discover evidence that might be used to prosecute him for a criminal offense. He submitted only after the police officer rejected his objection and directed the physician to proceed. The officer’s direction to the physician to administer the test over petitioner’s objection constituted compulsion for the purposes of the privilege. The critical question, then, is whether petitioner was thus compelled “to be a witness against himself.”

The withdrawal of blood necessarily involves puncturing the skin for extraction, and the percent by weight of alcohol in that blood, as established by chemical analysis, is evidence of criminal guilt. Compelled submission fails on one view to respect the “inviolability of the human personality.” Moreover, since it enables the State to rely on evidence forced from the accused, the compulsion violates at least one meaning of the requirement that the State procure the evidence against an accused “by its own independent labors.”

However, the privilege has never been given the full scope which the values it helps to protect suggest. History and a long line of authorities in lower courts have consistently limited its protection to situations in which the State seeks to submerge those values by obtaining the evidence against an accused through “the cruel, simple expedient of compelling it from his own mouth…. In sum, the privilege is fulfilled only when the person is guaranteed the right ‘to remain silent unless he chooses to speak in the unfettered exercise of his own will.’” The leading case in this Court is _Holt v. United States_, 218 U.S. 245 [1910]. There the question was whether evidence was admissible that the accused, prior to trial and over his protest, put on a blouse that fitted him. It was contended that compelling the accused to submit to the demand that he model the blouse violated the privilege. Mr. Justice Holmes, speaking for the Court, rejected the argument as “based upon an extravagant extension of the Fifth Amendment,” and went on to say, “The prohibition of compelling a man in a criminal court to be witness against himself is a prohibition of the use of physical or moral compulsion to extort communications from him, not an exclusion of his body as evidence when it may be material. The objection in principle would forbid a jury to look at a prisoner and compare his features with a photograph in proof.”

Both federal and state courts have usually held that it offers no protection against compulsion to submit to fingerprinting, photographing, or measurements, to write or speak for identification, to appear in court, to stand, to assume a stance, to walk, or to make a particular gesture. The distinction which has emerged, often expressed in different ways, is that the privilege is a bar against compelling “communications” or “testimony,” but that compulsion which makes a suspect or accused the source of “real or physical evidence” does not violate it.

Holding

In the present case, however, no…problem of application is presented. Not even a shadow of testimonial compulsion upon or enforced communication by the accused was involved either in the extraction or in the chemical analysis. Petitioner’s testimonial capacities were in no way implicated; indeed, his participation, except as a donor, was irrelevant to the results of the test, which depend on chemical analysis and on that alone. Since the blood test evidence, although an incriminating product of compulsion, was neither petitioner’s testimony nor evidence relating to some communicative act or writing by the petitioner, it was not inadmissible on privilege grounds.…

Dissenting, Black, J., joined by Douglas, J.

The Court admits that “the State compelled [petitioner] to submit to an attempt to discover evidence [in his blood] that might be [and was] used to prosecute him for a criminal offense.” To reach the conclusion that compelling a person to give his blood to help the State convict him is not equivalent to compelling him to be a witness against himself strikes me as quite an extraordinary feat. It seems to me that the compulsory extraction of petitioner’s blood for analysis so that the person who analyzed it could give evidence to convict him had both a “testimonial” and a “communicative nature.” The sole purpose of this project which proved to be successful was to obtain “testimony” from some person to prove that petitioner had alcohol in his blood at the time he was arrested. And the purpose of the project was certainly “communicative” in that the analysis of the blood was to supply information to enable a witness to communicate to the court and jury that petitioner was more or less drunk.

How can it reasonably be doubted that the blood test evidence was not in all respects the actual equivalent of “testimony” taken from petitioner when the result of the test was offered as testimony, was considered by the jury as testimony, and the jury’s verdict of guilt rests in part on that testimony? The refined, subtle reasoning and balancing process used here to narrow the scope of the Bill of Rights’ safeguard against self-incrimination provides a handy instrument for further narrowing of that constitutional protection, as well as others, in the future. Believing with the Framers that these constitutional safeguards broadly construed by independent tribunals of justice provide our best hope for keeping our people free from governmental oppression, I deeply regret the Court’s holding.

Miranda v. Arizona

In 1966, in Miranda v. Arizona, a five-judge majority of the U.S. Supreme Court held that the prosecution may not use statements stemming from the custodial interrogation absent procedural safeguards to protect a defendant’s Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination. The Court majority concluded that absent a three-part Miranda warning, the “inhently coercive” pressures of police interrogation had been proven to overwhelm individuals’ capacity to exercise their right against self-incrimination, and no confession given under these conditions “can truly be the product of a suspect’s free choice.”

What were these coercive pressures? According to the Court, individuals held in detention were isolated from friends, family, and lawyers in unfamiliar surroundings and were subject to sophisticated psychological tactics, manipulation, and trickery designed to wear down their resistance. The Court pointed to police manuals instructing officers to engage in tactics such as displaying confidence in a suspect’s guilt, minimizing the seriousness of the offense, wearing down individuals through continuous interrogation, and using the “Mutt and Jeff” strategy in which one officer berates a suspect and the other gains the suspect’s trust by playing the part of his or her protector. The “false lineup” involves placing a suspect in a lineup and using fictitious witnesses to identify the suspect as the perpetrator. In another scenario, fictitious witnesses identify the defendant as the perpetrator of a previously undisclosed serious crime, and the defendant panics and confesses to the offense under investigation.

Before you begin to read the Miranda decision, you may find it interesting to learn about Ernesto Miranda, the individual whose name is attached to one of the most important U.S. Supreme Court decisions in recent history. Miranda was in constant trouble as a young man and committed a felony car theft in 1954 while in the eighth grade. This arrest was followed by a string of convictions and brief detentions for burglary, attempted rape and assault, curfew violations, “Peeping Tom” activities, and car theft. In 1959, Miranda was sentenced to a year in prison and, following his release, seemingly settled down and found a regular job, moved in with a woman, and fathered a child. In 1963, Miranda reverted to his previous pattern of criminal behavior and kidnapped and raped eighteen-year-old “Jane Doe.” The victim identified him in a lineup, and his car had been seen in the neighborhood of the attack. Miranda confessed in less than two hours and was convicted and sentenced to not less than twenty nor more than thirty years in prison. Miranda’s conviction was affirmed by the Arizona Supreme Court, and his lawyers appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court.

In reading Miranda v. Arizona, pay attention to the procedural protections the Supreme Court requires that the police provide a suspect. Why are these specific protections required?

Was Miranda’s confession admissible at trial?

Facts

On March 13, 1963, petitioner, Ernesto Miranda, was arrested at his home and taken in custody to a Phoenix police station. He was there identified by the complaining witness. The police then took him to “Interrogation Room No. 2” of the detective bureau. There, he was questioned by two police officers. The officers admitted at trial that Miranda was not advised that he had a right to have an attorney present. Two hours later, the officers emerged from the interrogation room with a written confession signed by Miranda. At the top of the statement was a typed paragraph stating that the confession was made voluntarily, without threats or promises of immunity, and “with full knowledge of my legal rights, understanding any statement I make may be used against me.” At his trial before a jury, the written confession was admitted into evidence over the objection of defense counsel.

Miranda was found guilty of kidnapping and rape. He was sentenced to twenty to thirty years imprisonment on each count, the sentences to run concurrently. On appeal, the Supreme Court of Arizona held that Miranda’s constitutional rights were not violated in obtaining the confession and affirmed the conviction. . . . The Court emphasized the fact that Miranda did not specifically request counsel. . . .

Issue

The constitutional issue we decide . . . is the admissibility of statements obtained from a defendant questioned while in custody or otherwise deprived of his freedom of action in any significant way. In each of the four cases before the Court, the defendant was questioned by police officers, detectives, or a prosecuting attorney in a room in which he was cut off from the outside world. In none of these cases was the defendant given a full and effective warning of his rights at the outset of the interrogation process. In all the cases, the questioning elicited oral admissions, and in three of them, signed statements as well which were admitted at their trials. They all thus share salient features—incriminating interrogation of individuals in a police-dominated atmosphere, resulting in self-incriminating statements without full warnings of constitutional rights. . . .

Reasoning

We start here, as we did in Escobedo, with the premise that our holding is not an innovation in our jurisprudence, but is an application of principles long recognized and applied in other settings. We have undertaken a thorough reexamination of the Escobedo decision and the principles it announced, and we reaffirm it. That case was but an explication of basic rights that are enshrined in our Constitution—that “No person . . . shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself,” and that “the accused shall . . . have the Assistance of Counsel”—rights which were put in jeopardy in that case through official overbearing. These precious rights were fixed in our Constitution only after centuries of persecution and struggle. . . .

An understanding of the nature and setting of this in-custody interrogation is essential to our decisions today. The difficulty in depicting what transpires at such interrogations stems from the fact that in this country they have largely taken place incommunicado. From extensive factual studies undertaken in the early 1930s, including the famous Wickersham Report to Congress by a Presidential Commission, it is clear that police violence and the “third degree” flourished at that time. . . . [However] we stress that the modern practice of in-custody interrogation is psychologically rather than physically oriented. Interrogation still takes place in privacy. . . . A valuable source of information about present police practices . . . may be found in various police manuals and texts which document procedures employed with success in the past, and which recommend various other effective tactics... [T]he setting prescribed by the manuals and observed in practice becomes clear. In essence, it is this: To be alone with the subject is essential to prevent distraction and to deprive him of any outside support. The aura of confidence in his guilt undermines his will to resist. He merely confirms the preconceived story the police seek to have him describe. Patience and persistence, at times relentless questioning, are employed. To obtain a confession, the interrogator must “patiently maneuver himself or his quarry into a position from which the desired objective may be attained.” When normal procedures fail to produce the needed result, the police may resort to deceptive stratagems such as giving false legal advice. It is important to keep the subject off balance, for example, by trading on his insecurity about himself or his surroundings. The police then persuade, trick, or cajole him out of exercising his constitutional rights....

In the cases before us today, given this background, we concern ourselves primarily with this interrogation atmosphere and the evils it can bring. In Miranda v. Arizona, the police arrested the defendant and took him to a special interrogation room where they secured a confession. In Vignera v. New York, the defendant made oral admissions to the police after interrogation in the afternoon, and then signed an inculpatory statement upon being questioned by an assistant district attorney later the same evening. In Westover v. United States, the defendant was handed over to the Federal Bureau of Investigation by local authorities after they had detained and interrogated him for a lengthy period, both at night and the following morning. After some two hours of questioning, the federal officers had obtained signed statements from the defendant. Lastly, in California v. Stewart, the local police held the defendant five days in the station and interrogated him on nine separate occasions before they secured his inculpatory statement.... The potentiality for compulsion is forcefully apparent, for example, in Miranda, where the indigent Mexican defendant was a seriously disturbed individual with pronounced sexual fantasies, and in Stewart, in which the defendant was an indigent Los Angeles Negro who had dropped out of school in the sixth grade. To be sure, the records do not evince overt physical coercion or patent psychological ploys. The fact remains that in none of these cases did the officers undertake to afford appropriate safeguards at the outset of the interrogation to insure that the statements were truly the product of free choice.

It is obvious that such an interrogation environment is created for no purpose other than to subjugate the individual to the will of his examiner. This atmosphere carries its own badge of intimidation. To be sure, this is not physical intimidation, but it is equally destructive of human dignity. The current practice of incommunicado interrogation is at odds with one of our Nation’s most cherished principles—that the individual may not be compelled to incriminate himself. Unless adequate protective devices are employed to dispel the compulsion inherent in custodial surroundings, no statement obtained from the defendant can truly be the product of his free choice.

The question in these cases is whether the privilege is fully applicable during a period of custodial interrogation. In this Court, the privilege has consistently been accorded a liberal construction. We are satisfied that all the principles embodied in the privilege apply to informal compulsion exerted by law-enforcement officers during in-custody questioning. An individual swept from familiar surroundings into police custody, surrounded by antagonistic forces, and subjected to the techniques of persuasion...cannot be otherwise than under compulsion to speak. As a practical matter, the compulsion to speak in the isolated setting of the police station may well be greater than in courts or other official investigations, where there are often impartial observers to guard against intimidation or trickery....

Today, then, there can be no doubt that the Fifth Amendment privilege is available outside of criminal court proceedings and serves to protect persons in all settings in which their freedom of action is curtailed in any significant way from being compelled to incriminate themselves. We have concluded that without proper safeguards, the process of in-custody interrogation of persons suspected or accused of crime contains inherently compelling pressures which work to undermine the individual’s will to resist and to compel him to speak where he would not otherwise do so freely. In order to combat these pressures and to permit a full opportunity to exercise the privilege against self-incrimination, the accused must be adequately and effectively apprised of his rights and the exercise of those rights must be fully honored.

Holding

At the outset, if a person in custody is to be subjected to interrogation, he must first be informed in clear and unequivocal terms that he has the right to remain silent. For those unaware of the privilege, the warning is needed simply to make them aware of it—the threshold requirement for an intelligent decision as to its exercise. More important, such a warning is an absolute prerequisite in overcoming the inherent pressures of the interrogation atmosphere.... In accord with our decision today, it is impermissible to penalize an individual for exercising his Fifth Amendment privilege when he is under police custodial interrogation. The prosecution may not, therefore, use at trial the fact that he stood mute or claimed his privilege in the face of accusation....

The Fifth Amendment privilege is so fundamental to our system of constitutional rule and the expedient of giving an adequate warning as to the availability of the privilege so simple, we will not pause to inquire in individual cases whether the defendant was aware of his rights without a warning being given.
The warning of the right to remain silent must be accompanied by the explanation that anything said can and will be used against the individual in court. This warning is needed in order to make him aware not only of the privilege, but also of the consequences of forgoing it.

The circumstances surrounding in-custody interrogation can operate very quickly to overbear the will of one merely made aware of his privilege by his interrogators. Therefore, the right to have counsel present at the interrogation is indispensable to the protection of the Fifth Amendment privilege under the system we delineate today. Our aim is to assure that the individual's right to choose between silence and speech remains unfettered throughout the interrogation process.

[T]he need for counsel to protect the Fifth Amendment privilege comprehends not merely a right to consult with counsel prior to questioning, but also to have counsel present during any questioning if the defendant so desires.

The presence of counsel at the interrogation may serve several significant subsidiary functions as well. If the accused decides to talk to his interrogators, the assistance of counsel can mitigate the dangers of untrustworthiness. With a lawyer present, the likelihood that the police will practice coercion is reduced, and if coercion is nevertheless exercised, the lawyer can testify to it in court. The presence of a lawyer can also help to guarantee that the accused gives a fully accurate statement to the police and that the statement is rightly reported by the prosecution at trial. No effective waiver of the right to counsel during interrogation can be recognized unless specifically made after the warnings we here delineate have been given. The accused who does not know his rights and therefore does not make a request may be the person who most needs counsel.

Accordingly, we hold that an individual held for interrogation must be clearly informed that he has the right to consult with a lawyer and to have the lawyer with him during interrogation under the system for protecting the privilege we delineate today. As with the warnings of the right to remain silent and that anything stated can be used in evidence against him, this warning is an absolute prerequisite to interrogation.

No amount of circumstantial evidence that the person may have been aware of this right will suffice to stand in its stead. Only through such a warning is there ascertainable assurance that the accused was aware of this right.

If an individual indicates that he wishes the assistance of counsel before any interrogation occurs, the authorities cannot rationally ignore or deny his request on the basis that the individual does not have or cannot afford a retained attorney. The need for counsel in order to protect the privilege exists for the indigent as well as the affluent. While authorities are not required to relieve the accused of his poverty, they have the obligation not to take advantage of indigence in the administration of justice.

In order fully to apprise a person interrogated of the extent of his rights under this system then, it is necessary to warn him not only that he has the right to consult with an attorney, but also that if he is indigent, a lawyer will be appointed to represent him. Without this additional warning, the admonition of the right to consult with counsel would often be understood as meaning only that he can consult with a lawyer if he has one or has the funds to obtain one. The warning of a right to counsel would be hollow if not couched in terms that would convey to the indigent—the person most often subjected to interrogation—the knowledge that he too has a right to have counsel present. As with the warnings of the right to remain silent and of the general right to counsel, only by effective and express explanation to the indigent of this right can there be assurance that he was truly in a position to exercise it.

Once warnings have been given, the subsequent procedure is clear. If the individual indicates in any manner, at any time prior to or during questioning, that he wishes to remain silent, the interrogation must cease. At this point, he has shown that he intends to exercise his Fifth Amendment privilege; any statement taken after the person invokes his privilege cannot be other than the product of compulsion, subtle or otherwise. Without the right to cut off questioning, the setting of in-custody interrogation operates on the individual to overcome free choice in producing a statement after the privilege has been once invoked. If the individual states that he wants an attorney, the interrogation must cease until an attorney is present. At that time, the individual must have an opportunity to confer with the attorney and to have him present during any subsequent questioning. If the individual cannot obtain an attorney and he indicates that he wants one before speaking to police, they must respect his decision to remain silent.

This does not mean, as some have suggested, that each police station must have a “station house lawyer” present at all times to advise prisoners. It does mean, however, that if police propose to interrogate a person, they must make known to him that he is entitled to a lawyer and that if he cannot afford one, a lawyer will be provided for him prior to any interrogation. If authorities conclude that they will not provide counsel during a reasonable period of time in which investigation in the field is carried out, they may refrain from doing so without violating the person’s Fifth Amendment privilege so long as they do not question him during that time.

If the interrogation continues without the presence of an attorney and a statement is taken, a heavy burden rests on the government to demonstrate that the defendant knowingly and intelligently waived his privilege against self-incrimination and his right to retained or appointed counsel. An express statement that the individual is willing to make a statement and does not want an attorney followed closely by a statement could constitute a waiver. But a valid waiver will not be presumed simply from the silence of the accused after warnings are given or simply from the fact that a confession was in fact eventually obtained.

Whatever the testimony of the authorities as to waiver of rights by an accused, the fact of lengthy interrogation or incommunicado incarceration before a statement is made is strong evidence that the accused did not validly waive his rights. In these circumstances, the fact that the individual eventually made a statement is consistent with the conclusion that the compelling influence of the interrogation finally forced him to do so. It is inconsistent with any notion of a voluntary relinquishment of the privilege. Moreover, any evidence that the accused was threatened, tricked, or cajoled into a waiver will, of course, show that the defendant did not voluntarily waive his privilege. The requirement of warnings and waiver of rights is a fundamental with respect to the Fifth Amendment privilege and not simply a preliminary ritual to existing methods of interrogation.

General on-the-scene questioning as to facts surrounding a crime or other general questioning of citizens in the fact-finding process is not affected by our holding. It is an act of responsible citizenship for individuals to give whatever information they may have to aid in law enforcement. In such situations, the compelling atmosphere inherent in the process of in-custody interrogation is not necessarily present. There is no requirement that police stop a person who enters a police station and states that he wishes to confess to a crime, or a person who calls the police to offer a confession or any other statement he desires to make. Volunteered statements of any kind are not barred by the Fifth Amendment privilege and not simply a preliminary test of litigation. Where probable cause exists to arrest someone, at the outset of an interview, that he is not required to make a statement, that any statement may be used against him in court, that the individual may obtain the services of an attorney of his own choice and, more recently, that he has a right to free counsel if he is unable to pay. The practice of the FBI can readily be emulated by state and local enforcement agencies. The experience in some other countries also suggests that the danger to law enforcement in curbs on interrogation is overplayed. There appears to have been no marked detrimental effect on criminal law enforcement in these jurisdictions as a result of these rules. Conditions of law enforcement in our country are sufficiently similar to permit reference to this experience as assurance that lawlessness will not result from warning an individual of his rights or allowing him to exercise them.

Dissenting, Clark, J.

Rather than employing the arbitrary Fifth Amendment rule which the Court lays down, I would following the more pliable dictates of Due Process Clauses of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments which we are accustomed to administering and which...are effective instruments in protecting persons in police custody. In this way, we would not be acting in the dark nor in one full sweep change the traditional rules of custodial interrogation which this Court has for so long recognized as a justifiable and proper tool in balancing individual rights against the rights of society.

Dissenting, White, J., joined by Harlan, J., and Stewart, J.

The proposition that the privilege against self-incrimination forbids in custody interrogation without the warnings specified in the majority opinion and without a clear waiver of counsel has no significant support in the history of the privilege or in the language of the Fifth Amendment. The Court has not discovered or found the law in making today's decision, nor has it derived it from some irrefutable sources; what is has done is to make new law and new public policy.

The obvious underpinning of the Court's decision is a deep-seated distrust of all confessions. The rule announced today is a deliberate calculus to prevent interrogations, to reduce the incidence of confessions and pleas of guilty, and to increase the number of trials. It is something else again to remove from the ordinary criminal case all those confessions which heretofore have been held to be free and voluntary acts of the accused and to thus establish a new constitutional barrier to the ascertainment of truth by the judicial process. There is... every reason to believe that a good many criminal defendants who otherwise would have been convicted on what this Court has previously thought to be the most satisfactory kind of evidence, will now under this new version of the Fifth Amendment, either not be tried at all or acquitted if the State's evidence, minus the confession, is put to the test of litigation. Here probable cause exists to arrest several suspects...it will often be true that a suspect may be cleared only through the results of interrogation of other suspects. Here too the release of the innocent may be delayed by the Court's rule.

Much of the trouble with the Court's new rule is that it will operate...in all criminal cases, regardless of the severity of the crime or the circumstances involved...It will slow down the investigation and the apprehension of confederates in those cases where time is of the essence, such as kidnapping, those involving the national security, [and] some organized crime situations.

Cases and Comments

1. Miranda. Miranda was retried for kidnapping and rape. The twenty-one-year-old Jane Doe testified against him but, on cross-examination, admitted that she was unable to positively identify Miranda as the perpetrator. Miranda’s common law wife, however, came forward and testified that Miranda had confided in her that he had committed the kidnapping and rape and that he had asked her to tell Doe that he would marry her if she would drop the charges. Miranda then asked his wife to show Doe their baby daughter and to ask her to drop the charges so that the baby could be with her father. Miranda was once again convicted and was sentenced to serve twenty to thirty years in prison. In 1972, at the age of thirty, Miranda was paroled. He was returned to prison when he was found with a gun and illegal drugs in violation of the terms of his parole. Miranda was released in 1975 and sold autographed “Miranda warning cards” to raise money. In January 1976, while drinking and playing cards, he got involved in a bar fight and was stabbed to death. You can read about the Miranda case in Liva Baker, Miranda: Crime, Law, and Politics (New York: Atheneum, 1983).

2. Interrogation Techniques. Saul M. Kassin and Gisli H. Gudjonsson are two of the most prominent psychologists working in the area of interrogation and confessions. The two scholars found that a number of suspects waive their Miranda rights because of an inability to fully comprehend the warnings. This may result from youth, a lack of intelligence or education, or an inability to understand their rights. Some commentators suggest that individuals who lack confidence or who are inexperienced in the criminal justice process also may have a difficult time asserting their rights in the presence of the police.

Individuals who waive their rights may confront sophisticated police interrogation tactics. Kassin and Gudjonsson (2005) find that police interrogation techniques result in confessions from roughly forty-two percent of individuals subjected to police interrogation. They write that the police are advised to conduct interrogations in a small, sparsely furnished room in order to isolate the suspect and to make him or her uncomfortable and feel cramped and confined. The police are taught to align themselves with the suspect by justifying or excusing the crime. This, for example, might entail portraying the act as understandable under the circumstances. The police also are instructed to stress that the victim’s behavior contributed to the crime and to minimize the seriousness of the suspect’s actions. Another tactic is to display a certainty in the suspect’s guilt and to immediately interrupt and challenge the suspect’s denial of guilt or claim that he or she acted out of self-defense. The police also are instructed to encourage the suspect to unburden his or her guilt and to provide a written or oral account of the crime. Kassin and Gudjonsson observe that although most people confess for a variety of reasons, the most powerful factor is the suspect’s belief that the police have evidence implicating him or her in the crime, such as fingerprint, hair, or blood evidence.

Miller v. Fenton is a leading case on police interrogation tactics. Frank Miller was a suspect in the murder and accompanied the police to a state police barracks. He was read and waived his Miranda rights. The issue was whether Detective Boyce had employed tactics during the fifty-three-minute interrogation that “were sufficiently manipulative to overbear the will of a person with [the defendant’s] characteristics.” The majority concluded that Miller’s confession was voluntary “under the circumstances.”

Miller was thirty-two, had some high school education, and previously had served time in prison. During the interrogation, Boyce falsely told Miller that the deceased was alive, hoping that the possibility that the victim would identify Miller as the assailant would persuade him to confess to the crime and to “cut a deal.” Boyce, having met with no success, arranged to receive a phone call during the interrogation and announced with mock surprise that the victim had just died. Boyce, with apparent concern, then sympathetically related that he knew that Miller suffered from mental problems and that Boyce would like to insure that Miller received psychological help. Boyce next stressed that Miller was “not responsible” or a “criminal,” that the death must be “eating you up,” that “you’ve got to come forward,” and that he wanted to help Miller “unburden his inner tensions.” Roughly one hour passed before Miller confessed and collapsed in a robot-like state onto the floor and was taken to the hospital.

The two-judge majority indicated that Boyd’s interrogation “did not produce psychological pressure strong enough to overbear the will of a mature, experienced man [like Miller] who was suffering from no mental or physical illness and was interrogated for less than an hour at a police station close to home.” Judge Gibbons, in dissent, criticized the majority for adopting a test that asked the court to speculate on the impact of Boyce’s “promises and lies” on Miller. Gibbon, instead, argued that that when the police resort to promises of psychological help and assure suspects that they will not be punished, the confession should be ruled inadmissible. Do you agree with the two-judge majority or with Judge Gibbons? See Miller v. Fenton, 796 F.2d 598 (3d Cir. 1986).

8.2 YOU DECIDE

Robert L. Brown was charged in a Louisiana court with unlawful possession of heroin. He was convicted and sentenced to ten years in prison. Brown was apprehended when he unsuccessfully attempted to flee from a police raid of a drug house. He was advised that he had a right to speak or remain silent, that anything he said might be used against him, and that he had a right to counsel. During the reading of the Miranda warnings, Brown proclaimed, “I know all that.” Brown then confessed that he used narcotics and, in fact, had injected earlier in the day.

A federal district court pointed out that Brown was not told that he had the right to have an attorney present if he decided to make a statement and that he was not told that a lawyer would be appointed to represent him in the event that he lacked funds. One of the arresting officers also testified that he did not afford the defendant “any opportunity to procure a lawyer.” Did Brown's statement that “I know all that” constitute a waiver of Brown's right to receive the full Miranda warnings? Legal Equation

Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination and police interrogation = The prosecution may not use inculpatory or exculpatory statements stemming from custodial interrogation of the defendant unless it demonstrates use of procedural safeguards effective to secure privilege against self-incrimination

Custodial interrogation is questioning initiated by law enforcement officers after an individual has been taken into custody or deprived of his or her freedom of action in a significant way

Prior to any questions, the suspect must be clearly and unequivocally informed that he or she has the right to remain silent, that any statement he or she makes may be used as evidence against him or her, and that he or she has the right to the presence of an attorney, appointed or retained
Chapter 8 Interrogations and Confessions

Miranda, as we have seen, supplemented the due process voluntariness test by requiring that the police read suspects subjected to custodial interrogation the Miranda warnings. The decision in Miranda sparked a wave of criticism, and in 1968, the U.S. Congress took the aggressive step of passing legislation that required federal judges to apply the voluntariness test. The Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act provided that a confession shall be admissible as evidence in federal court if it is “voluntarily given.” The Act listed a number of factors that judges were to consider in determining whether a confession was voluntary.

In 2000, in Dickerson v. United States, Chief Justice William Rehnquist, who himself had been a constant critic of Miranda, held that Miranda was a “constitutional decision” that is required by the Fifth Amendment to insure that detainees are able to exercise their right against self-incrimination in the inherently coercive atmosphere of custodial interrogation. This is an important statement because laws passed by Congress are required to conform to the U.S. Constitution, in this instance, the Fifth Amendment. Congress accordingly lacked authority to instruct the judiciary to disregard the requirements of Miranda and to rely solely on the voluntariness test. Justice Rehnquist also stressed that Miranda has become “embedded in routine police practice to the point where the warnings have become part of our national culture” (Dickerson v. United States, 530 U.S. 428 [2000]). We now will examine the central elements of the Miranda rule:

- custodial interrogation,
- public safety exception,
- three-part warning,
- invocation of Miranda rights,
- interrogation, and
- waiver of and right to counsel.
In reading this chapter, you will see that although the Supreme Court affirmed the constitutional status of the Miranda decision, the requirements of Miranda are constantly being adjusted in an effort to balance Miranda's protection of suspects against society's interest in obtaining confessions. As you progress through the chapter, ask yourself whether the Miranda warnings provide adequate protection for defendants. In the alternative, does Miranda handcuff the police? In addition, consider whether the Miranda rules are too complex to be easily absorbed by police, lawyers, and judges. We start by examining custodial interrogation.

Custodial Interrogation

The Miranda warnings are triggered when an individual is in custody and interrogated. The Miranda decision defines custodial interrogation as “questioning initiated by law enforcement officers after a person has been taken into custody or otherwise deprived of his [or her] freedom of action in any significant way.” In Beckwith v. United States, the Supreme Court clarified that a focus by law enforcement on an individual is not sufficient to require the reading of the Miranda rights. In Beckwith, two Internal Revenue Service (IRS) agents interviewed Beckwith for three hours in a private home; the conversation was described by one of the agents as “friendly” and “relaxed.” The Supreme Court held that being the focus of an investigation does not involve the inherently coercive pressures that Miranda described as inherent in incommunicado custodial interrogation (Beckwith v. United States, 425 U.S. 341 [1976]).

What then is meant by custodial interrogation? Miranda stated that it is not considered custody and the Miranda warnings are not required when the police engage in general questioning at a crime scene or other general investigative questioning of potential witnesses. The Miranda warnings also need not be given to an individual who voluntarily enters a police station and wishes to confess to a crime or to a person who voluntarily calls the police to offer a confession or other statement. On the other hand, the Miranda warnings are required when an individual is subjected to a custodial arrest and to interrogation. At this point, an individual is under the control of the police and likely will be subjected to incommunicado interrogation in an isolated and unfamiliar environment.

The challenge is to determine at what point, short of being informed that he or she is under custodial arrest, an individual is exposed to pressures that are the “functional equivalent of custodial arrest” and the Miranda rights must be read. What if you are walking home and are stopped by the police late at night and they ask what you are doing in the neighborhood? This has important consequences for law enforcement. Requiring Miranda warnings whenever an officer comes in contact with a citizen would impede questioning. This might make sense because every citizen interaction with an officer is somewhat intimidating and coercive. On the other hand, requiring a clearly coercive environment before the Miranda warnings are required would limit the Miranda warnings to a narrow set of circumstances. How does the Supreme Court resolve these considerations? At what point short of a custodial arrest are the Miranda warnings required.

The Supreme Court adopted an “objective test” for custodial interrogation that requires judges to evaluate the totality of the circumstances. In Stansbury v. California, the Supreme Court held that “the initial determination of custody depends on the objective circumstances of the interrogation, not on the subjective views harbored by either the interrogating officers or the person being questioned” (Stansbury v. California, 511 U.S. 318, 323 [1994]).

Custodial interrogation is not based solely on the seriousness of the crime for which you have been stopped and questioned or based simply on the location of the interrogation. Custody is based on whether, in the totality of the circumstances, a reasonable person would believe that he or she is subjected to formal arrest or to police custody to a degree associated with a formal arrest (i.e., the functional equivalent of formal arrest).

Courts typically ask whether a reasonable person would feel free to leave. In evaluating the totality of circumstances, judges consider a number of factors. Remember, no single factor is crucial in determining whether a reasonable person would believe that he or she is subject to custodial interrogation (not free to leave). The factors to be considered include the following:

- The number of police officers
- Whether the officer tells the individual that he or she is free to leave or not free to leave
- The length and intensity of the questioning
- Whether the officer employs physical force to restrain the individual
- Whether the stop is in public or in private
- The location of the interrogation
- Whether a reasonable person would believe that the stop would be brief or whether the stop would result in a custodial arrest
- Whether the individual is in familiar or unfamiliar surroundings
- Whether the suspect is permitted to leave following the interrogation

The totality-of-the-circumstances test means that custody is determined on a case-by-case basis. Consider the Supreme Court decisions in the following cases.

Home. In Orozco v. Texas, the Supreme Court held that the defendant was subjected to custodial interrogation when four police officers entered his bedroom at 4:00 A.M. to interrogate him regarding a shooting (Orozco v. Texas, 394 U.S. 324 [1969]).

Parole interview. Murphy, a probationer, agreed to meet his probation officer regarding his “treatment plan” and, during the meeting, admitted that he had committed a rape and murder. The Supreme Court found that Murphy was familiar both with the surroundings and with his probation officer and that he was not physically restrained and could have left at any time. The possibility that terminating the meeting would lead to revocation of probation, in the view of the Court, was not comparable to the pressure on a criminal suspect who is not free to walk away from interrogation by the police (Minnesota v. Murphy, 465 U.S. 420 [1984]).

Police station. In Oregon v. Mathiason, Carl Mathiason, a parolee, voluntarily appeared at the police station at the request of an officer. Mathiason confessed after the officer stated that he believed that the suspect was involved in a recent burglary, falsely told Mathiason that his fingerprints had been discovered at the scene of the crime, and explained that truthfulness would possibly be considered in mitigation at sentencing. The Supreme Court determined that there was no custodial interrogation because the defendant voluntarily came to the station house, was informed that he was not under arrest, and left following the interview (Oregon v. Mathiason, 429 U.S. 492 [1977]).

Prison. A prison inmate who is interrogated regarding a crime for which he was not incarcerated is considered to be in custody. Courts have recently held that an inmate is in custody for purposes of Miranda only when the interrogation is associated with tighter controls and restrictions than an inmate normally experiences in prison (Mathis v. United States, 391 U.S. 1 [1968]).

Traffic stop. In Berkemer v. McCarty, McCarty was stopped by Highway Patrol Officer Williams who observed McCarty weaving in and out of a lane. Williams observed that McCarty experienced difficulty with his balance when he exited the vehicle and concluded that he would charge him with a traffic arrest and take him into custody. McCarty was unable to successfully complete a field sobriety test and in response to questions admitted that he had consumed several beers and marijuana. McCarty was taken into custody without being read his Miranda rights and made several additional incriminating statements. McCarty was subsequently convicted of the first-degree misdemeanor of operating a motor vehicle while under the influence of drugs or alcohol. McCarty appealed and argued that he was in custody when pulled over by Officer Williams and should have been read his Miranda rights.

The Supreme Court rejected the argument that the Miranda warnings are required only for felonies. The Court nonetheless ruled that McCarty was not in custody when initially required to pull over, ruling that a traffic stop normally does not exert pressures that significantly impair an individual’s exercise of his or her Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination. Traffic stops presumably are brief and public and typically are not police dominated. The Supreme Court also held that between the initial stop and the custodial arrest, McCarty was not subject to constraints “comparable” to formal arrest. During this relatively short period, Williams did not communicate his intent to arrest McCarty, and his unarticulated plan was considered to have little relevance to the question of custody. The relevant inquiry in determining whether an individual is in custody is how a reasonable person in the suspect’s situation would understand his or her situation. Would a reasonable person feel free to leave (not in custody), or would a reasonable person feel that his or her freedom of movement was restricted (custody)? In this case, a single police officer asked a limited number of questions and requested that McCarty perform a field sobriety test. The Supreme Court held that McCarty was not subjected to the “functional equivalent of formal arrest” (Berkemer v. McCarty, 468 U.S. 420 [1984]).

Apply what you have read to Yarborough v. Alvarado, which is the Supreme Court’s most recent attempt to outline the factors to be considered in determining whether a defendant is subjected to custodial interrogation. The judgment is important for establishing that in applying the reasonable person standard, an individual’s age, experience, and other personal characteristics are not to be considered.

Legal Equation

\text{Custody} = \text{Custodial arrest or functional equivalent of custodial arrest.}

\text{Functional equivalent of custodial arrest} = \text{A reasonable person}

Was Alvarado in custody?

Yarborough v. Alvarado, 541 U.S. 652 (2004), Kennedy, J.

Facts

Paul Soto and respondent Michael Alvarado attempted to steal a truck in the parking lot of a shopping mall in Santa Fe Springs, California. Soto and Alvarado were part of a larger group of teenagers at the mall that night. Soto decided to steal the truck, and Alvarado agreed to help. Soto pulled out a .357 Magnum and approached the driver, Francisco Castaneda, who was standing near the truck emptying trash into a dumpster. Soto demanded money and the ignition keys from Castaneda. Alvarado, then five months short of his eighteenth birthday, approached the passenger side door of the truck and crouched down. When Castaneda refused to comply with Soto’s demands, Soto shot Castaneda, killing him. Alvarado then helped hide Soto’s gun.

Los Angeles County Sheriff’s detective Cheryl Comstock led the investigation into the circumstances of Castaneda's death. About a month after the shooting, Comstock left word at Alvarado's house and also contacted Alvarado's mother at work with the message that she wished to speak with Alvarado. Alvarado's parents brought him to the Pico Rivera Sheriff's Station to be interviewed around lunchtime. They waited in the lobby while Alvarado went with Comstock to be interviewed. Alvarado contends that his parents asked to be present during the interview but were rebuffed.

Comstock brought Alvarado to a small interview room and began interviewing him at about 12:30 p.m. The interview lasted about two hours and was recorded by Comstock with Alvarado's knowledge. Only Comstock and Alvarado were present. Alvarado was not given a warning under Miranda v. Arizona. Comstock began the interview by asking Alvarado to recount the events on the night of the shooting. On that night, Alvarado explained, he had been drinking alcohol at a friend's house with some other friends and acquaintances. After a few hours, part of the group went home and the rest walked to a nearby mall to use its public telephones. In Alvarado's initial telling, that was the end of it. The group went back to the friend's home and "just went to bed." Unpersuaded, Comstock pressed on.

At this point, Alvarado slowly began to change his story. First, he acknowledged being present when the carjaking occurred but claimed that he did not know what happened or who had a gun. When he hesitated to say more, Comstock tried to encourage Alvarado to discuss what happened by appealing to his sense of honesty and the need to bring the man who shot Castaneda to justice…Alvarado then admitted he had helped the other man try to steal the truck by standing near the passenger side door. Next, he admitted that the other man was Paul Soto, that he knew Soto was armed, and that he had helped hide the gun after the murder. Alvarado explained that he had expected Soto to scare the driver with the gun, but that he did not expect Soto to kill anyone. Toward the end of the interview, Comstock twice asked Alvarado if he needed to take a break. At the end of the interview, Alvarado went home. All of these objective facts are consistent with an interrogation environment in which a reasonable person would have felt free to terminate the interview and leave…

Other facts point in the opposite direction. Comstock interviewed Alvarado at the police station. The interview lasted two hours…Comstock did not tell Alvarado that he was free to leave. Alvarado was brought to the police station by his legal guardians rather than arriving on his own accord, making the extent of his control over his presence unclear. Counsel for Alvarado alleges that Alvarado's parents asked to be present at the interview but were rebuffed, a fact that—if known to Alvarado—might reasonably have led someone in Alvarado's position to feel more restricted than otherwise. These facts weigh in favor of the view that Alvarado was in custody.

The Ninth Circuit placed considerable reliance on Alvarado's age and inexperience with law enforcement. Our Court has not stated that a suspect's age or experience is relevant to the Miranda custody analysis….The objective test furthers "the clarity of Miranda, ensuring that the police do not need to make guesses…[in] deciding how they may interrogate the suspect."…

Issue

The issue before the Supreme Court is whether Alvarado should have been provided with Miranda warnings…

Reasoning

Fair-minded jurists could disagree over whether Alvarado was in custody. On one hand, certain facts weigh against a finding that Alvarado was in custody. The police did not transport Alvarado to the station or require him to appear at a particular time. They did not threaten him or suggest he would be placed under arrest. Alvarado's parents remained in the lobby during the interview, suggesting that the interview would be brief. In fact, according to trial counsel for Alvarado, he and his parents were told that the interview was "not going to be long." During the interview, Comstock focused on Soto's crimes rather than Alvarado's. Instead of pressuring Alvarado with the threat of arrest and prosecution, she appealed to his interest in telling the truth and being helpful to a police officer. In addition, Comstock twice asked Alvarado if he wanted to take a break. At the end of the interview, Alvarado went home. All of these objective facts are consistent with an interrogation environment in which a reasonable person would have felt free to terminate the interview and leave…

The Ninth Circuit placed considerable reliance on Alvarado's age and inexperience with law enforcement. Our Court has not stated that a suspect's age or experience is relevant to the Miranda custody analysis….The objective test furthers "the clarity of Miranda, ensuring that the police do not need to make guesses…[in] deciding how they may interrogate the suspect."…
Holding

These differing indications lead us to hold that the state court’s application of our custody standard was reasonable. The court of appeals was nowhere close to the mark when it concluded otherwise. . . .

Dissenting, Breyer, J., joined by Stevens, J., Souter, J., and Ginsburg, J.

Would a reasonable person in Alvarado’s position have felt free simply to get up and walk out of the small room in the station house at will during his two-hour police interrogation? I ask the reader to put himself, or herself, in Alvarado’s circumstances and then answer that question: Alvarado hears from his parents that he is needed for police questioning. His parents take him to the station. On arrival, a police officer separates him from his parents. His parents ask to come along, but the officer says they may not. . . .

The police take Alvarado to a small interrogation room, away from the station’s public area. A single officer begins to question him, making clear in the process that the police have evidence that he participated in an attempted carjacking connected with a murder. When he says that he never saw any shooting, the officer suggests that he is lying, while adding that she is “giving [him] the opportunity to tell the truth” and “take care of himself.” Toward the end of the questioning, the officer gives him permission to take a bathroom or water break. After two hours, by which time he has admitted he was involved in the attempted theft, knew about the gun, and helped to hide it, the questioning ends. . . . A reasonable person would not have thought he was free simply to pick up and leave. . . . In this case, common sense and an understanding of the law’s basic purpose in this area are enough to make clear that Alvarado’s age—an objective, widely shared characteristic about which the police plainly knew—is also relevant to the inquiry. Unless one is prepared to pretend that Alvarado is someone he is not, a middle-aged gentleman, well-versed in police practices, it seems to me clear that the California courts made a serious mistake. I agree with the Ninth Circuit’s similar conclusions. Consequently, I dissent.

Questions for Discussion

1. What legal test was used by the Supreme Court to determine whether Alvarado was subjected to custodial interrogation? List the facts relied on by the majority in concluding that Alvarado was not subjected to custodial interrogation. Summarize the facts that support the dissenting justices’ view that Alvarado was subjected to custodial interrogation.

2. How would you change the facts to result in a majority of the judges holding that Alvarado was subjected to custodial interrogation?

3. The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals considered what a “reasonable seventeen-year-old with no prior history of arrest or police interviews” would perceive. Explain why the Supreme Court held that the reasonable person standard should not take the suspect’s age or background into consideration. Do you agree? What if Alvarado was fifteen years old?

4. How would you rule in this case?

5. Problems in policing. Yarbrough illustrates the challenge in applying the totality-of-the-circumstances approach to custody. Write a brief set of guidelines informing police officers how they can lawfully interrogate a suspect at the station house without being required to read the Miranda rights. For instance, in some jurisdictions, the police will inform suspects that voluntarily come to police headquarters that they are not under arrest and are free to leave. This reinforces that the interrogation is a voluntary encounter and that the Miranda rights are not required to be read. This is often referred to as the Beheler warning based on the tactics employed in California v. Beheler (463 U.S. 1121 [1983]).

Mesa shot both his wife and daughter and barricaded himself in a hotel room. FBI agents surrounded the area and called on Mesa through a bullhorn to surrender. Mesa was armed, and the FBI did not know whether he was holding hostages. An FBI “hostage negotiator” and Mesa communicated over a mobile phone for over three hours. In response to questions from the negotiator, Mesa engaged in lengthy descriptions of his life and frustrations and occasionally conversed with the negotiator. Mesa made some incriminating comments during this conversation that were used against him at trial. Should Mesa have been read his Miranda rights? See United States v. Mesa, 638 F.2d 582 (3d Cir. 1980).

The Public Safety Exception

In New York v. Quarles, the U.S. Supreme Court recognized a public safety exception to Miranda. This exception permits the police to ask questions reasonably prompted by a concern with public safety without first advising a suspect of his or her Miranda rights. The Supreme Court explained that a reasonable concern with the safety of the police or the public outweighs the interest in protecting a suspect’s right against self-incrimination. This “narrow exception” requires that questions be directed at public safety rather than guilt or innocence. Coerced and involuntary statements are not admissible under the public safety rule. Reliance on the public safety exception requires that the following steps be satisfied (New York v. Quarles, 467 U.S. 649 [1984]).

- Reasonableness. There must be a reasonable need to protect the police or the public. The exception does not depend on the officer’s subjective motivation.
- Threat. There must be a reasonable belief that the threat is immediate.
- Questions. Questions must be prompted by a reasonable concern for public safety and must be directed at public safety rather than guilt or innocence.
- Coercion. The statements may not be the product of police compulsion that overcomes the suspect’s will to resist.

New York v. Quarles broadly defines public safety and offers no clear guidance to lower court judges and the police. A police officer who concludes that there is a threat to public safety and who fails to administer the Miranda warnings may find that the trial judge disagrees and orders the confession excluded from evidence. The lack of a clear definition of public safety also runs the risk that courts will broadly interpret the public safety exception. In United States v. Reyes, the police arrested a narcotics dealer who an informant reported might be armed. Reyes, when asked by the arresting officer whether he had “anything in his pocket that could harm the officer,” responded that he had a gun. The officer removed the firearm and repeated the question. Reyes stated that there were drugs in his car. The federal court of appeals ruled that the officer’s question was directed at public safety and that the drugs were properly admitted into evidence at Reyes’s trial, but the court warned of the “inherent risk that the public safety exception might be distorted into a general rule” that individuals arrested on narcotics charges could be questioned in every instance prior to reading the Miranda rights (United States v. Reyes, 353 F.3d 148, 155 [2d Cir. 2003]).

In United States v. Newton, police officers received a complaint from Newton’s mother that Newton, a parolee, had threatened to kill her and her husband. She reported that Newton was staying in their apartment and reportedly kept a gun in a shoe box by the door. The police entered the apartment and handcuffed Newton without advising him of his Miranda rights. An officer asked whether Newton had any contraband in the apartment, and Newton replied, “only what is in the box.” The police seized a .22 caliber automatic pistol. The Second Circuit Court of Appeals held that the question fell within the public safety exception based on the officers’ knowledge that Newton possessed a gun and had recently threatened to kill two people. Although Newton was handcuffed, his girlfriend was in the apartment and might have handed Newton the gun. The officer’s question concerning “contraband” could include material not presenting immediate safety concerns, but the appellate court noted that Newton clearly understood this to include weapons. The Second Circuit stressed that the police could not be expected to closely edit their questions when conducting an arrest (United States v. Newton, 369 F.3d 659 [2d Cir. 2004]).

You can find New York v. Quarles on the study site. Do the facts in Quarles support the claim that the public safety was endangered? Consider the argument of the dissent questioning whether law enforcement requires a public safety exception to Miranda. Are questions directed at public safety also relevant for a suspect’s guilt or innocence?

Carrillo was arrested for selling narcotics and was transported to the detention facility. Before beginning to search Carrillo and prior to reading Carrillo his Miranda rights, Officer Weeks asked Carrillo “if he had any drugs or needles on his person.” Carrillo responded, “No, I don’t use drugs, I sell them.” Weeks asked no additional questions.

John Wayne Dean and his wife kidnapped Ellen, the daughter of a wealthy family, and demanded a ransom. Throughout the negotiation, there was no indication whether the young woman was dead or alive or how she was being treated. Four days later, FBI agents staked out the “drop location.” Agent Krahlung spotted Dean in the woods, armed with a pistol. Krahlung pointed a shotgun at Dean and ordered him to throw down his gun. He then drew his pistol and ordered Dean to lie on the ground. Krahlung proceeded to handcuff Dean and holstered his service revolver. In response to a question from Krahlung, Dean then revealed where Ellen was being held, and she subsequently was rescued. The Miranda Warnings

The three-part Miranda warnings inform suspects of their Fifth Amendment rights and the consequences of waiving these rights. These warnings require that the police inform individuals of the right to remain silent, that anything they say may be used against them, and of their right to an attorney, retained or appointed. The Miranda judgment specifies that the rights are to be recited in “clear and unequivocal terms” and that a suspect should be “clearly informed” of his or her rights. At this point, you might want to review the Supreme Court’s explanation as to why the police are required to read Miranda rights to suspects.

These rights may be communicated to a suspect verbally, or a suspect may be asked to read the rights for himself or herself. In practice, the police typically employ both approaches. How should the rights be read to a suspect? As a judge, you might take the position that the rights must be read as set forth in the Miranda decision. On the other hand, you might take the position that a suspect’s rights can be effectively communicated without using the precise language of the Miranda judgment. This would be a practical recognition that an officer in the field may not have access to a Miranda card or may inadvertently depart from the required warnings. What are the costs and benefits of these alternative approaches?

The Supreme Court has provided broad guidance to the police on how to recite the Miranda warnings. Miranda is a flexible formula. The test is whether the warnings viewed in their totality convey the essential information to the suspect.

In 1981, in California v. Prysock, Police Sergeant Byrd told the suspect, Randall Prysock, that he had “the right to talk to a lawyer before you are questioned, have him present with you while you are being questioned, and all during the questioning.” Prysock then was informed that as a juvenile, he had the right to have his “parents present, which they are.” Sergeant Byrd completed the warnings on Randall’s right to a lawyer by advising Prysock that “you have the right to have a lawyer appointed to represent you at no cost to yourself.” Mrs. Prysock stated that she “didn’t understand,” inquired if her son “could still have an attorney at a later time if he gave a statement now without one,” and agreed that Randall would talk to the Sergeant (California v. Prysock, 453 U.S. 355, 356, 357 [1981]).

The outcome of this case centered on the meaning of the term represent. Does this mean that a lawyer will be appointed to represent Randall at trial while Randall would have to pay for any attorney before that time? Did Sergeant Byrd contribute to the confusion by giving two separate warnings regarding the right to a lawyer and using the term represent rather than the term consult, which is the term used in the Miranda decision? The U.S. Supreme Court majority ruled that the “rigidity” of Miranda does not extend to the precise formulation of the warnings given a criminal defendant. The judges noted that the Miranda judgment indicates that “no talismanic incantation” was required to satisfy its strictures. Three dissenting judges argued that Sergeant Byrd’s warnings did not adequately inform Prysock of his rights and that “a lawyer appointed to represent you” could reasonably have been understood by Mrs. Prysock to refer to a lawyer at trial.

If Miranda is not a talismanic incantation, how much flexibility is permitted? At what point are the rights so inadequately and incoherently read that a suspect is not fully and effectively informed of his or her rights? In Duckworth v. Eagan, the defendant was arrested for an attempted murder and was informed that he had the right to the advice and presence of a lawyer, “even if you cannot afford to hire one.” Eagan then was told that “we have no way of giving you a lawyer, but one will be appointed for you, if you wish, if and when you go to court.” The police officer then stated that Eagan had the right to answer or not to answer questions and that he had “the right to stop answering at any time until you’ve talked to a lawyer.” The Supreme Court pointed out that the “if and when language” merely provided the defendant with the additional information that in Indiana, lawyers are appointed at the defendant’s initial appearance in court and that, if he requested an appointed attorney, the police would not question him until a lawyer was present (Duckworth v. Eagan, 492 U.S. 195 [1989]).

The Supreme Court stressed that the warnings in their totality satisfied Miranda and, most important, that Eagan was informed of his immediate right to a lawyer and right to refuse to answer questions until a lawyer was present. The test was whether the warnings reasonably conveyed the Miranda rights. The Supreme Court majority stressed that judges should not closely examine every word of the Miranda warnings as if “construing a will or defining the terms of an easement.” The four dissenting judges observed that the “if and when you go to court” language would reasonably lead a suspect to believe that a lawyer would not be appointed until “some indeterminate time in the future after questioning.” Justice Marshall noted that an unsophisticated suspect might be understandably confused and decide to talk to the police in an “effort to extricate himself from his predicament.”

In both Prysock and Duckworth, the warnings in their totality were held to satisfy the requirements of Miranda. On the other hand, warnings that judges have considered to fail to provide the essential information required by the Miranda rights or which judges have concluded are misleading have been held to be inadequate. An example of a deficient warning is the statement that the suspect had “the right to talk to an attorney and have him here with you before we ask you any questions.” This warning was held to be deficient because it failed to inform the suspect of the right to an attorney during questioning. The same court also rejected as inadequate a verbal warning that “if you decide to answer questions now without an attorney present, you will give up the right to stop answering questions until you speak to an attorney.” This distorted the fact that a suspect could stop answering questions at any time (Brown v. Crosby, 249 F. Supp. 2d 1285, 1304 [S.D. Fla. 2003]).

In 2001, the Supreme Court unanimously ruled that it would not review the lower court judgment in Bridgers v. Texas. Three justices took advantage of this occasion to announce that they would not approve of warnings that failed to fully inform suspects of their Miranda rights. The police in Bridgers neglected to inform the defendant that he had the right to consult an attorney not only prior to but also during questioning. The three justices wrote that the warnings left out “an essential…element” and warned in the event that this problem “proves to be a recurring one…it may well warrant the Court’s attention” (Bridgers v. Texas, 532 U.S. 1034 [2001]).

The Supreme Court also has been reluctant to require the police to expand the warnings beyond the three-part warning required in the Miranda judgment. In Colorado v. Spring, Spring waived his rights presumably thinking that he would be interrogated by federal agents on an illegal gun charge and then was surprised with a question regarding a homicide. The Supreme Court held that Spring’s admission that he had “shot [a] guy once” was admissible. The Court explained that Spring had been read his Miranda rights and that it was neither trickery nor deception for the police to fail to inform him of the topic of interrogation (Colorado v. Spring, 479 U.S. 546 [1987]). The next case in the text, Moran v. Burbine, asks whether the police are required to go beyond the warnings required in the Miranda judgment and inform a suspect of the availability of an attorney.

On the morning of March 3, 1977, Mary Jo Hickey was found unconscious in a factory parking lot in Providence, Rhode Island. Suffering from injuries to her skull apparently inflicted by a metal pipe found at the scene, she was rushed to a nearby hospital. Three weeks later, she died from her wounds.

Several months after her death, the Cranston, Rhode Island, police arrested respondent and two others in connection with a local burglary. Shortly before the arrest, Detective Ferranti of the Cranston police force had learned from a confidential informant that the man responsible for Ms. Hickey’s death lived at a certain address and went by the name of “Butch.” Upon discovering that respondent lived at that address and was known by that name, Detective Ferranti informed respondent of his Miranda rights. When respondent refused to execute a written waiver, Detective Ferranti spoke separately with the two other suspects arrested on the breaking and entering charge and obtained statements further implicating respondent in Ms. Hickey’s murder. At approximately 6 p.m., Detective Ferranti telephoned the police in Providence to convey the information he had uncovered. An hour later, three officers from that department arrived at the Cranston headquarters for the purpose of questioning respondent about the murder.

That same evening, at about 7:45 p.m., respondent’s sister telephoned the public defender’s office to obtain legal assistance for her brother. Her sole concern was the breaking and entering charge, as she was unaware that respondent was then under suspicion for murder. She asked for Richard Casparian, who had been scheduled to meet with respondent earlier that afternoon to discuss another charge unrelated to either the break-in or the murder. As soon as the conversation ended, the attorney who took the call attempted to reach Mr. Casparian. When those efforts were unsuccessful, she telephoned Allegra Munson, another assistant public defender, and told her about respondent’s arrest and his sister’s subsequent request that the office represent him.

At 8:15 p.m., Ms. Munson telephoned the Cranston police station and asked that her call be transferred to the detective division. A male voice responded with the word “Detectives.” Ms. Munson identified herself and asked if Brian Burbine was being held; the person responded affirmatively. Ms. Munson explained to the person that Burbine was represented by attorney Casparian who was not available; she further stated that she would act as Burbine’s legal counsel in the event that the police intended to place him in a lineup or question him. The unidentified person told Ms. Munson that the police would not be questioning Burbine or putting him in a lineup and that they were through with him for the night. Ms. Munson was not informed that the Providence Police were at the Cranston police station or that Burbine was a suspect in Mary’s murder. At all relevant times, respondent was unaware of his sister’s efforts to retain counsel and of the fact and contents of Ms. Munson’s telephone conversation.

Less than an hour later, the police brought respondent to an interrogation room and conducted the first of a series of interviews concerning the murder. Prior to each session, respondent was informed of his Miranda rights, and on three separate occasions, he signed a written form acknowledging that he understood his right to the presence of an attorney and explicitly indicating that he “[d]id not want an attorney called or appointed for [him]” before he gave a statement. Uncontradicted evidence at the suppression hearing indicated that at least twice during the course of the evening, respondent was left in a room where he had access to a telephone, which he apparently declined to use. Eventually, respondent signed three written statements fully admitting to the murder.

Prior to trial, respondent moved to suppress the statements. The court denied the motion, finding that respondent had received the Miranda warnings and had “knowingly, intelligently, and voluntarily waived his privilege against self-incrimination [and] his right to counsel.” The jury found respondent guilty of murder in the first degree, and he appealed to the Supreme Court of Rhode Island. A divided court rejected his contention that the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution required the suppression of the inculpatory statements and affirmed the conviction.

We granted certiorari to decide whether a prearrangement confession preceded by an otherwise valid waiver must be suppressed either because the police misinformed an inquiring attorney about their plans concerning the suspect or because they failed to inform the suspect of the attorney's efforts to reach him.

Reasoning

The record amply supports the state-court findings that the police administered the required warnings, sought to assure that respondent understood his rights, and obtained an express written waiver prior to eliciting each of the three statements. Nor does respondent contest the Rhode Island courts' determination that he at no point requested the presence of a lawyer. He contends instead that the confessions must be suppressed because the police's failure to inform him of the attorney's telephone call deprived him of information essential to his ability to knowingly waive his Fifth Amendment rights. In the alternative, he suggests that to fully protect the Fifth Amendment values served by Miranda, we should extend that decision to condemn the conduct of the Providence police…

The purpose of the Miranda warnings instead is to dissipate the compulsion inherent in custodial interrogation and, in so doing, guard against abridgment of the suspect's Fifth Amendment rights. Clearly, a rule that focuses on how the police treat an attorney—conduct that has no relevance at all to the degree of compulsion experienced by the defendant during interrogation—would ignore both Miranda's mission and its only source of legitimacy.

Nor are we prepared to adopt a rule requiring that the police inform a suspect of an attorney's efforts to reach him. While such a rule might add marginally to Miranda's goal of dispelling the compulsion inherent in custodial interrogation, overriding practical considerations counsel against its adoption. As we have stressed on numerous occasions, "[one of the principal advantages] of Miranda is the ease and clarity of its application…. We have little doubt that the approach urged by respondent…would have the inevitable consequence of muddying Miranda's otherwise relatively clear waters. The legal questions it would spawn are legion: To what extent should the police be held accountable for knowing that the accused has counsel? Is it enough that someone in the station house knows, or must the interrogating officer himself know of counsel's efforts to contact the suspect? Do counsel's efforts to talk to the suspect concerning one criminal investigation trigger the obligation to inform the defendant before interrogation may proceed on a wholly separate matter?…

Holding

The position urged by respondent would upset this carefully drawn approach in a manner that is both unnecessary for the protection of the Fifth Amendment privilege and injurious to legitimate law enforcement. Because, as Miranda holds, full comprehension of the rights to remain silent and request an attorney are sufficient to dispel whatever coercion is inherent in the interrogation process, a rule requiring the police to inform the suspect of an attorney's efforts to contact him would contribute to the protection of the Fifth Amendment privilege only incidentally, if at all. This minimal benefit, however, would come at a substantial cost to society's legitimate and substantial interest in securing admissions of guilt. Indeed, the very premise of the court of appeals was not that awareness of Ms. Munson's phone call would have dissipated the coercion of the interrogation room, but that it might have convinced respondent not to speak at all. Because neither the letter nor purposes of Miranda require this additional handicap on otherwise permissible investigatory efforts, we are unwilling to expand the Miranda rules to require the police to keep the suspect abreast of the status of his legal representation….

Dissenting, Stevens, J., joined by Brennan, J., and Marshall, J.

What is the cost of requiring the police to inform a suspect of his attorney's call? It would decrease the likelihood that custodial interrogation will enable the police to obtain a confession. This is certainly a real cost, but it is the same cost that this Court has repeatedly found necessary to preserve the character of our free society…. Just as the "cost" does not justify taking a suspect into custody or interrogating him without giving him warnings simply because police desire to question him, so too the "cost" does not justify permitting police to withhold from a suspect knowledge of an attorney's communications, even though that communication would have an unquestionable effect on the suspect's exercise of his rights. The "cost" that concerns the Court amounts to nothing more than an acknowledgment that the law enforcement interest in obtaining convictions suffers whenever a suspect exercises the rights that are afforded by our system of criminal justice.…

In my view, as a matter of law, the police deception of Munson was tantamount to deception of Burbine himself. It constituted a violation of Burbine's right to have an attorney present during the questioning that began shortly thereafter…. If a lawyer is seen as a nettlesome obstacle to the pursuit of wrongdoers…then the Court's decision today makes a good deal of sense. If a lawyer is seen as an aid to the understanding and protection of constitutional rights…then today's decision makes no sense at all.….
Questions for Discussion

1. Why does the Supreme Court hold that the police are not required to inform Burbine of the availability of a lawyer? What problems would requiring this warning create in terms of judicial supervision of the Miranda rule?

2. What is your reaction to the Court’s holding that the inadvertent or intentional misleading of a lawyer is not relevant in determining whether Burbine’s waiver was knowing, voluntary, and intelligent?

3. What if Burbine signed a contract with a lawyer providing that “if I am ever arrested, you are obligated to advise me during any police interrogation”? Would the police be obligated under this contract to inform Burbine that his lawyer was at the police station and ready to assist him under such circumstances?

4. Do you believe that Burbine’s waiver was knowing, voluntary, and intelligent in light of the fact that he was not informed of the availability of a public defender?

5. Problems in policing. Write a policy guideline for the police discussing the reading of the Miranda warnings and detailing how the police should treat a lawyer who appears at a police station while a suspect is being subjected to custodial interrogation.

Cases and Comments

Criminal Procedure in the States. Several state supreme courts have rejected the Supreme Court’s reasoning in Burbine and have held that their state constitutions require the police to inform a defendant of an attorney’s immediate availability.

In People v. McCauley, the police brought McCauley to the Chicago Area Three police station in connection with a shooting death. Detectives Kocan and Byron advised McCauley of his Miranda rights, and he offered an alibi statement. After roughly thirty minutes, the officers told their supervisor that they were leaving to interview witnesses to the shooting. Roughly thirty minutes later, at 7:00 p.m., attorney William O. Walters received a phone call from McCauley’s family. Walters phoned a number of police stations, including Area Three, and was informed that the suspect was not there. He nevertheless went to the Area Three station and asked to speak to McCauley. The desk sergeant telephoned upstairs and, at roughly 7:40 p.m., Sergeant Bonke came downstairs and told Walters that he could not speak with McCauley and that McCauley had not asked to speak with a lawyer in any event. They disagreed over whether McCauley’s constitutional rights were being violated. Bonke told Walters that McCauley was voluntarily at the station and was not a target of the investigation. Bonke said that he would call Walters if McCauley became a target. Walters waited at the station ten more minutes and left at 8:00 p.m. Bonke disputed much of Walters’s testimony.

Detectives Kocan and Byron returned to Area Three between 8:00 p.m. and 8:15 p.m. and told McCauley that his alibi had not been corroborated. Around 10:00 p.m., McCauley was identified in a lineup. An hour later, McCauley was again interrogated and repeated his earlier alibi. At roughly 1:00 a.m., Kocan successfully located the defendant’s alibi witnesses and told McCauley that they did not support his story. He was subsequently charged with the shooting.

The Illinois Supreme Court observed that a state is free to interpret its constitution to provide greater protections than are available under the U.S. Constitution. A suspect’s right against self-incrimination is guaranteed by the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments of the U.S. Constitution and by Article I, Section 10 of the Illinois Constitution. The Illinois Supreme Court held that the state constitutional guarantees “simply do not permit police to delude custodial suspects...into falsely believing they are without immediately available legal counsel and to also prevent that counsel from accessing and assisting their clients during the interrogation.” This constitutes an interference with the client–attorney relationship and places pressure on the police to extract a confession before the suspect requests or learns of the presence of a lawyer.

The Illinois Supreme Court stressed that “if a defendant is entitled to the benefit of an attorney’s assistance and presence during custodial interrogation...certainly fundamental fairness requires that immediately available assistance and presence not be denied by police authorities.” The Supreme Court concluded that McCauley had been denied the information required to make a voluntary, knowing, and intelligent waiver and that it was contrary to the American constitutional system to fear the consequences of individuals’ exercise of their rights and liberties. Statements made after Walters was denied access to McCauley accordingly should be suppressed. Do you believe that McCauley would have invoked his right to counsel if informed that his family had contacted a lawyer who was available to talk to him. Do you support the approach of the Illinois Supreme Court? See People v. McCauley, 163 Ill. 2d 414 (Ill. 1994).
Invoking the Miranda Rights

Following the reading of the Miranda rights, a defendant may assert his or her right to a lawyer or right to silence or may waive both of these rights. Is it sufficient that a defendant indicates that he or she “might” want a lawyer or “probably” should remain silent? Are the police required to ask the defendant to clarify his or her intent?

In Davis v. United States, Davis, a member of the Navy, was suspected of murdering another sailor and, when interviewed by the Naval Investigative Service, initially waived his Miranda rights. An hour and a half into the interview, Davis blurted out that “maybe I should talk to a lawyer.” One of the agents later testified at trial that we made it clear that we “weren’t going to pursue the matter unless we have it clarified is he asking for a lawyer or is he just making a comment about a lawyer.” Davis replied, “No, I’m not asking for a lawyer,” and then added, “No, I don’t want a lawyer.” Following a break in the interrogation, the investigators again read Davis his Miranda rights, and the interview continued for an additional hour. At this point, Davis asserted, “I think I want a lawyer before I say anything,” and the investigators stopped their interrogation (Davis v. United States, 512 U.S. 452 [1994]).

Did Davis invoke his right to an attorney when he remarked that “maybe” he should talk to a lawyer? Was he then impermissibly persuaded to continue the interrogation as a result of the investigators’ request for clarification? The U.S. Supreme Court held that an individual intending to assert his or her right to have counsel present must articulate this “sufficiently clearly that a reasonable police officer in the circumstances would understand the statement to be a request for an attorney.” A rule that required the police to cease questioning following an ambiguous statement by the accused would transform Miranda into a “wholly irrational obstacle to interrogations.”

In other words, the investigators were free to continue interrogating Davis following his ambiguous statement as to whether he “should talk to a lawyer.” They were not required to clarify his intent. In fact, in an effort to clarify a suspect’s statement, the police might be accused of influencing the suspect to waive his or her right to an attorney. For example, in Hart v. A.G., a police officer was asked by the suspect about the pros and cons of hiring a lawyer. The Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals ruled that an officer had discouraged the suspect from invoking his right to an attorney when the officer stated that “I’m going to want to ask you questions and he’s [the lawyer] going to tell you can’t answer me,” but I am telling you that “honesty wouldn’t hurt” (Hart v. A.G., 323 F.3d 884 [11th Cir. 2003]).

Justice Souter, writing on behalf of four concurring judges in Davis, observed that the Court’s ruling in Davis would impose a special hardship on the poor and uneducated and on women and minorities. These individuals were particularly likely to feel overwhelmed by the interrogation process and would find it difficult to assert themselves. Justice Souter accordingly favored requiring the police to clarify ambiguous statements that might “reasonably be understood” as expressing a desire for the protection of a lawyer.

In another important ruling, the Supreme Court held in Fare v. Michael C., that the right to a lawyer did not encompass a juvenile’s request to talk to his probation officer and that the juvenile’s confession was properly admitted at his murder trial. The Supreme Court explained that lawyers, rather than probation officers, clergy, or friends, are trained and equipped to protect a suspect’s right against self-incrimination (Fare v. Michael C., 442 U.S. 707 [1979]).
Courts also have required suspects invoking their right to silence to invoke this right in a clear and unambiguous fashion. The Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals held that a defendant’s statement that he “had nothing to say” was ambiguous because it could be interpreted as either an invocation of silence or an angry response. This was not considered a clear and unambiguous assertion of the right to silence, and the police had properly continued the interrogation (United States v. Banks, 78 F.3d 1190, 1198 [7th Cir. 1996]).

Legal Equation

| Invocation of Miranda rights | = | Sufficiently clear that a reasonable police officer would understand that the suspect is asserting a right to a lawyer or to silence. |

Waiver

A suspect, of course, may choose to waive his or her Miranda right to silence or right to an attorney. The Supreme Court stressed in Miranda that the government is required to meet a “heavy burden” in demonstrating that a suspect voluntarily, knowingly, and intelligently waived his or her rights. The Miranda judgment stated that a waiver requires an express statement and may not be presumed from the fact that an accused remains silent following the warnings.

What do we mean by a voluntary, knowing, and intelligent waiver? In Moran v. Burbine, the Supreme Court explained that a waiver inquiry involves a three-step process (475 U.S. 412, 421 [1985]).

Voluntary. The right must be voluntarily relinquished, it must be the product of a free and deliberate choice, and it may not be caused by intimidation, coercion, or deception. I am doing this because I want to; the police did not make me waive my rights.

Knowing and intelligent. The waiver must be made with a full awareness both of the nature of the right being abandoned and of the consequences of the decision to abandon the right. A suspect must possess sufficient mental competence to understand the rights and the significance of a waiver. I know what the Miranda rights mean and what may happen to me if I talk.

Totality of the circumstances. The determination whether the waiver is voluntary, knowing, and intelligent is based on the totality of the circumstances surrounding the interrogation. We cannot read your mind, but we can see from the entire situation that the police did not pressure you into waiving your rights, and you seemed to know what you were doing.

The prosecution is required to establish a knowing, voluntary, and intelligent waiver by a predominance of the evidence (fifty-one percent). The Supreme Court explained in Colorado v. Connelly that holding the prosecution to this relatively modest burden of proof is sufficient to deter illegal behavior on the part of the police (Colorado v. Connelly, 479 U.S. 157, 169 [1986]).

Voluntary

The Miranda decision noted that evidence that an accused was threatened, tricked, or cajoled (pressured) into a waiver is sufficient to establish that a suspect did not voluntarily waive his or her rights. A waiver also will not be recognized if obtained under coercive circumstances, such as a lengthy interrogation or a lengthy incarceration prior to the confession.

The Supreme Court has equated the test for voluntariness under Miranda with the due process voluntariness (“but for”) test that we discussed earlier in this chapter. In Oregon v.
Elstad, the Supreme Court dismissed the defendant’s claim that his confession was involuntary and explained that the defendant had not alleged “coercion of a confession by physical violence or other deliberate means calculated to break the suspect’s will” (Oregon v. Elstad, 470 U.S. 298, 312 [1985]).

As you recall, in Colorado v. Connelly, the Supreme Court ruled that a defendant’s confession that was the product of a mental disability was not involuntary for the purposes of Miranda. An involuntary confession requires an “essential link between coercive activity of the State, on the one hand, and a resulting confession by a defendant on the other.” In determining whether a confession is involuntary, a court will evaluate the impact of the police interrogation techniques in light of the totality of the circumstances. The factors to be considered include the following:

- Offender. The age, education, background, and other characteristics of the accused.
- Conditions of interrogation. The length of the interrogation or the length of the suspect’s detention prior to the reading of the Miranda rights.
- Interrogation techniques. Whether there was the threat or use of coercion, duress, or violence.
- Motivation. Whether the suspect had a reason to confess such as a desire for a reduced sentence that was not related to the actions of the police.

The question always is whether the totality of circumstances caused the defendant to involuntarily confess. Was his or her will overborne by the totality of the circumstances (Colorado v. Connelly, 479 U.S. 157, 166 [1986]).

Judges have generally been reluctant to find involuntary waivers in cases in which the police misrepresented or exaggerated the evidence against a suspect. In United States v. Velasquez, the police misrepresented the strength of the case against Velasquez by falsely informing her that a co-conspirator had implicated her in a drug scheme. The Third Circuit Court of Appeals ruled that the educated and experienced suspect had weighed and balanced various factors in deciding whether to waive her rights and that her co-conspirator’s alleged confession was only one consideration in her decision. In other words, Velasquez’s will and capacity for independent judgment were not overcome by the police officers’ misrepresentation; this was only one of many factors in her decision to talk to the police (United States v. Velasquez, 885 F.2d 1076, 1086 (3d Cir. 1989). The Second Circuit, in another case, ruled that a defendant’s confession was based on his desire to be isolated from society in order to prevent himself from continuing his pattern of uncontrollable violence and that his confession had not been caused by the false representation that his fingerprints had been identified at the crime scene (Green v. Scully, 850 F.2d 894 [2d Cir. 1988]).

Knowing and Intelligent

We have seen that a suspect is required to understand the meaning of the Miranda rights as well as the consequences of a waiver. Once having read the Miranda warnings, may an officer assume that a suspect fully comprehends his or her rights? What if an individual clearly does not understand the rights?

In Tague v. Louisiana, the arresting officer testified that he read Tague the Miranda warnings, but the officer “could not presently remember what those rights were…could not recall whether he asked [Tague] whether he understood the rights as read to him, and ‘couldn’t say yes or no’ whether he rendered any tests to determine whether [Tague] was literate or otherwise capable of understanding his rights.” The U.S. Supreme Court concluded that Louisiana had failed to satisfy the heavy burden of establishing that Tague knowingly and intelligently waived his rights before confessing. In other words, a police officer may not automatically assume that an individual knowingly and intelligently waived his or her rights (Tague v. Louisiana, 444 U.S. 469 [1980]).

What factors are relevant in determining whether a suspect’s waiver of Miranda is knowing and intelligent? In Fare v. Michael C., the Supreme Court indicated that this is based on the totality of the circumstances. Michael was sixteen and a half years of age and the Supreme Court indicated that the proper approach is to inquire into a “juvenile’s age, experience, education, background, and intelligence and into whether he [or she] has the capacity to understand the warnings given him [or her], the nature of his [or her] Fifth Amendment rights, and the consequences of waiving those rights.” The Court stressed that the police were careful to insure that Michael C. understood his rights and that he clearly indicated a desire to waive them. In addition, there was nothing in Michael’s background to indicate that he lacked the capacity to understand his rights. He was a sixteen-and-a-half-year-old juvenile who had significant experience in the criminal justice system, including a history of multiple arrests, internment in a youth camp, and having been on probation for several years. There also was no indication that he lacked the intelligence to understand the Miranda rights (Fare v. Michael C., 442 U.S. 707, 725–727 [1979]). Judges also examine a defendant’s behavior during interrogation. In United States v. Gaddy, the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals noted that despite the defendant’s addiction to drugs and his mental illness, he was of above-average intelligence, had been involved with the criminal justice system on several occasions in the past, and did not exhibit “scattered thinking, ‘panicky’ behavior,” severe depression, or anxiety during his interrogation and that his waiver was knowing and voluntary (United States v. Gaddy, 894 F.2d 1307, 1312 [11th Cir. 1990]).

We have already seen in Colorado v. Spring and in Moran v. Burbine that the Supreme Court has resisted requiring the police to incorporate additional information into the Miranda warnings, such as informing defendants of the topic of interrogation or of the availability of an attorney. The Court has stressed that the U.S. Constitution does not require that an individual be informed of all information that might prove useful in arriving at his or her decision, such as the strength of the prosecution’s case. The Supreme Court also has recognized that absent this information, a decision to talk might be voluntary but not necessarily the best course to follow (Colorado v. Spring, 479 U.S. 564, 577 [1987]). In other words, a voluntary, knowing, and intelligent waiver is not necessarily a wise waiver.

Express and Implied Waiver

A waiver, as we have seen, must be voluntary, knowing, and intelligent. Miranda indicated that an “express statement” that the individual is willing to make a statement and does not want an attorney followed closely by a statement constitutes a waiver and that a waiver will not be presumed from silence or “from the fact that a confession was in fact eventually obtained.” Have courts continued to require a clear and affirmative statement? Must a defendant sign a waiver form?

A mentally competent defendant who affirmatively waives his or her rights clearly meets the express waiver standard. However, the issue of waiver is not always this clear. Consider North Carolina v. Butler. Butler was convicted of kidnapping, armed robbery, and felonious assault stemming from the robbery of a service station and the shooting of the attendant. He was arrested and fully advised of his rights. Butler thereafter was taken to the FBI office, and after determining that he had an eleventh-grade education and was able to read, he was given a written Miranda warning form to review. Butler stated that he understood his rights and refused to sign the waiver of his right to silence and right to a lawyer at the bottom of the page. The FBI agents assured him that he was not required to speak or to sign the form and asked whether Butler was willing to talk to them. He replied that he would talk to the agents but would not sign the rights waiver form and then proceeded to make incriminating statements. An FBI agent testified at trial that Butler had said “nothing” when advised of his rights and attempted neither to request an attorney or to halt the interrogation (North Carolina v. Butler, 441 U.S. 369 [1979]).

The U.S. Supreme Court ruled that the prosecution’s burden is “great, but that... in some cases, a waiver can be clearly inferred from the actions and words of the person interrogated.” In these instances, the prosecution is required to establish that although there was no affirmative waiver, the suspect nevertheless understood his or her rights and engaged in a “course of conduct indicating waiver” (373). This is an implied waiver. Do you believe that Butler fully understood that he was waiving his Miranda rights? A similar issue arose in Connecticut v. Barrett, which you will find on the study site. Barrett was arrested for sexual assault and indicated that he would not provide a written statement without his lawyer but that he was happy to talk to the police. Was Barrett’s confession admissible?

Legal Equation

| Waiver | Voluntary, knowing, and intelligent |
|        | + An affirmative statement (express waiver) or totality of the circumstances (implied waiver). |

Waiver: Question First and Warn Later

In Elstad v. Oregon, the police visited the home of eighteen-year-old Michael James Elstad, briefly and casually interrogated him regarding a burglary, and obtained a voluntary incriminating statement. The officers then arrested Elstad and, at police headquarters, read Elstad his Miranda rights and obtained a detailed confession. The U.S. Supreme Court had no difficulty in ruling that the first confession was inadmissible because the officers had failed to read Elstad his Miranda rights. What of the second confession? Elstad clearly must have believed that there was little reason not to continue talking to the police after having already “let the cat out of the bag” concerning his guilt. It would seem only fair to require the police to inform Elstad that in considering whether to invoke his Miranda rights, he should be aware that his first confession was inadmissible.

The U.S. Supreme Court held that the unlawful character of Elstad’s first voluntary confession did not automatically taint his second voluntary confession and ruled that a “suspect who has once responded to unwarned yet uncoercive questioning is not thereby disabled from waiving his rights and confessing after he has been given the requisite Miranda warnings.” The Supreme Court found that the Miranda warnings cured the taint of the initial confession and that warning a suspect that his or her first confession was inadmissible was neither “practicable nor constitutionally necessary.” The police, according to the majority, were sufficiently deterred from failing to give the Miranda warning by excluding the first confession. Justices Brennan and Marshall in dissent criticized what they viewed as the Supreme Court’s growing impatience with constitutional rights and condemned their fellow justices for increasingly viewing civil liberties as impediments to combating crimes (Oregon v. Elstad, 470 U.S. 298, 312 [1985]).

Following Elstad, a number of police departments adopted a policy of interrogating suspects in “successive, unwarned and warned phases.” The Supreme Court reacted to this tactic in Missouri v. Seibert by reconsidering the judgment in Elstad. Patrice Seibert’s twelve-year-old son, Jonathan, had cerebral palsy and died in his sleep. Fearing charges of neglect because of the bedsores on Jonathan’s body, Seibert entered into a plan with her sons and some of their friends to incinerate Jonathan’s body in the family’s mobile home. They intentionally left Donald Rector, a mentally challenged teenager who lived with the Seiberts, in the home to give the impression that he was looking after Jonathan at the time of the fire.

Five days later, Seibert was arrested at the hospital where Donald was being treated for burns. She was taken to the police station and left alone in the interrogation room for fifteen to twenty minutes. Officer Hanrahan then followed orders and neglected to give Seibert the Miranda warnings prior to the thirty- to forty-minute interrogation. Seibert ultimately confessed to her crime and was given a twenty-minute break. Officer Hanrahan then turned on the tape recorder, indicated that they should continue their conversation, and gave Seibert the Miranda warnings, and Seibert waived her rights. Hanrahan initiated the questioning by confronting Seibert with her prewarning statements, and she immediately admitted that the plan was for Donald “to die in his sleep” (Missouri v. Seibert, 542 U.S. 600 [2004]).

The Supreme Court stated that the issue when the police question first and warn later is whether “it would be reasonable to find that in these circumstances the warnings could function ‘effectively’ to advise the suspect that he or she “had a real choice about giving an admissible statement.” In other words, when a suspect is warned that “anything you say may be used against you,” will he or she understand that the first confession is inadmissible and cannot be introduced into evidence to establish his or her guilt and that the defendant may find that it is in his or her self-interest to invoke the right to silence or the right to an attorney (613–614)?

The Supreme Court pointed out that in Elstad, one of the arresting officers likely was confused as to whether the suspect was in custodial interrogation and committed the “oversight” of casually remarking that he believed that Elstad was involved in the burglary. Elstad then confirmed that he was at the crime scene. The living-room conversation in Elstad was corrected at the police station when another officer read Elstad the Miranda warnings before undertaking a systematic interrogation. The Supreme Court noted that a reasonable person would view the station-house interrogation by a separate police officer as “a markedly different experience from the short conversation at home” (614).

In Seibert, the plurality of the Supreme Court concluded that the facts challenge the “efficacy of the Miranda warnings to the point that a reasonable person in the suspect’s shoes would not have understood them to convey a message that she retained a choice about continuing to talk.” In contrast to the casual, inadvertent, and brief questioning in Elstad, the facts in Seibert reveal a police strategy intended to undermine the Miranda warnings. Both the unwarned interrogation and the warned interrogation took place in the station house and were conducted by the same officer. The first interrogation was systematic, exhaustive, and conducted with psychological skill, and the officer did nothing to inform Seibert that the first confession could not be used against her. Officer Hanrahan gave the impression that the second interrogation was a continuation of the earlier questioning when he noted that he had been talking to Seibert about “what happened” (616–617). As you read Missouri v. Seibert on the study site, consider whether you agree with the Supreme Court decision.
Alexander Texidor was arrested by federal authorities for the unlawful purchase of firearms and agreed to provide the FBI with information concerning other individuals involved in the illicit trade in firearms. This led to the arrest of Luis Gonzalez-Lauzan Sr. on January 8, 2002. On January 28, 2002, Texidor was murdered and Senior and his son, Gonzalez-Lauzan Jr., and two other individuals were indicted for the murder in September 2002. Gonzalez-Lauzan Jr. was in prison on unrelated charges prior to the indictment when he was questioned by state and federal authorities in the interview room of the courthouse regarding Texidor’s murder. The three officers made a decision not to administer the Miranda warnings and spent between two and a half and three hours talking to Gonzalez-Lauzan Jr. The officers explained that they were working on a murder investigation and believed that Gonzalez-Lauzan Jr. was involved. The officers instructed Gonzalez-Lauzan Jr. that “we are not asking you any questions. We don’t want you to say anything. We just have something to say to you and we ask that you listen to it so that you can understand where we are coming from.” The officers described the evidence linking Gonzalez-Lauzan Jr. to the killing in detail and instructed him several times merely to listen when he occasionally interjected and denied involvement. After roughly two and a half hours, Gonzalez-Lauzan Jr. interrupted and exclaimed that “okay, you got me.” Gonzalez-Lauzan Jr. was then immediately read his Miranda rights and signed a form agreeing to waive his rights. He admitted that he instructed the co-conspirators to teach Texidor a lesson, that he had provided the murder weapon, and that he had been present at the killing. Is Gonzalez-Lauzan Jr.’s confession admissible? See United States v. Gonzalez-Lauzan Jr., 437 F.3d 1128 (11th Cir. 2006). See also Hairston v. United States, 905 A.2d 765 (D.C. 2006).

Waiver Following Invocation of the Miranda Rights

Once an individual invokes his or her Miranda rights, are the police prohibited from questioning him or her again? On one hand, the police clearly are obligated to respect a suspect’s desire to invoke his or her Miranda rights. On the other hand, the police may desire to confront a suspect with new evidence or to question a suspect concerning an unrelated offense. How does the Supreme Court balance these competing interests?

The Supreme Court has established one legal test in those instances in which a defendant invokes his or her right to silence and another legal test in those instances in which a defendant invokes his or her right to an attorney. In this section, we will describe the two legal tests and explain the reason for the Court’s reliance on separate tests. We first turn to the approach employed when a suspect invokes his or her right to silence.

In Michigan v. Mosley, Mosley was arrested in connection with two robberies. He was read his Miranda rights and invoked his right to silence, and the robbery detective ceased questioning. The detective then took Mosley to the cell block. Two hours later, Mosley was moved to the homicide bureau for questioning about “an unrelated holdup murder.” He once again was advised of his rights and this time waived them and made an incriminating statement. Mosley later appealed that his second interrogation for murder was unlawful and pointed out that Miranda clearly stated that if an individual indicates at any time that he wishes to remain silent, the interrogation must cease. Did this mean that the police interrogation of Mosley for the homicide was a violation of his right against self-incrimination (Michigan v. Mosley, 423 U.S. 96 [1975])?

The U.S. Supreme Court ruled that the Detroit police acted in lawful fashion. The legal test for whether a statement obtained after a person in custody decides to remain silent depends on whether his or her right to silence was scrupulously honored. What does this mean?

- The police immediately ceased questioning.
- The police suspended interrogation for a significant period.
- The police provided a fresh set of Miranda warnings.
- The second interrogation focused on a crime different in time, nature, and place.
The Supreme Court stressed that the critical consideration is whether the police respected Mosley’s “right to cut off questioning.” This was not a situation in which the police failed to honor a decision to terminate questioning by refusing to discontinue the interrogation or by engaging in repeated efforts to wear down Mosley’s resistance and pressure him to change his mind.

The dissent pointed out that Mosley initially did not want to talk about the robberies and argued that the police had taken advantage of the coercive environment of Mosley’s incommunicado detention to extract a confession to an unrelated criminal offense.

The scrupulously-honored test is subject to several criticisms. Clearly, the police were aware when they arrested Mosley that he possibly was involved in a killing, and the Court’s holding invites the police to subject a defendant to a series of interrogations when they have evidence of the defendant’s involvement in multiple crimes. What did the Supreme Court mean when it required that the second interrogation address a crime different in time, nature, and place? What about a bank robber who flees in a car and hits a pedestrian? Are the bank robbery and auto accident different in time, nature, and place?

An example of the application of Mosley is United States v. Tyler. Tyler was arrested for the murder of a government informant and, after being read his Miranda rights, invoked his right to silence. He was taken to a small room in the police barracks in which a timeline of the murder investigation and crime scene photographs were pasted to the wall. After several hours, Detective Ronald Egolf entered the room and engaged Tyler in a general discussion on his family, education, and hunting and, after roughly an hour, directed Tyler to “tell the truth.” Tyler allegedly started to cry. Egolf again warned him of his Miranda rights, and Tyler confessed to involvement in the murder. The Third Circuit Court of Appeals held that Tyler’s interrogation was inconsistent with “scrupulously honoring Tyler’s assertion of silence.” Can you explain the court’s decision (United States v. Tyler, 164 F.3d 150, 155 [3d Cir. 1998]).

The Supreme Court, in Edwards v. Arizona, established a separate initiation test for determining whether a defendant who invokes his or her right to an attorney may be once again interrogated. Under what circumstances would a waiver and subsequent confession be considered voluntary, knowing, and intelligent? The facts in Edwards are remarkably similar to the facts in Mosley. Edwards was arrested for burglary, robbery, and murder and then waived his rights, agreed to talk, and later asserted his right to counsel. The next morning, two detectives approached Edwards and again read him his Miranda rights. Edwards agreed to talk to the police and confessed.

The confession obtained by the detectives to a crime to which Edwards earlier had invoked his right to counsel clearly would be inadmissible under the Mosley test. The U.S. Supreme Court, however, explained that a new test was required because an individual who invokes his or her right to counsel clearly lacks confidence in his or her ability to withstand the pressures of interrogation and desires the help of a lawyer. The Court held that Edwards “is not subject to further interrogation by the authorities until counsel has been made available to him, unless the accused himself initiates further communication, exchanges or conversations with the police.” A confession obtained in the absence of counsel is presumed to be involuntary (Edwards v. Arizona, 451 U.S. 477, 484–485 [1981]).

In Arizona v. Roberson, the Supreme Court extended Edwards, which prohibits reinterrogation about the same crime, to prohibit the police from reinterrogating a suspect about a different crime. Justice Stevens explained that a suspect who requests a lawyer clearly believes that he or she is in need of legal assistance regardless of whether interrogated about the same offense or a different offense. Stevens reasoned that such a suspect who is again approached by the police will find it difficult to overcome the pressures of custodial interrogation and again assert his or her right to a lawyer. Justice Kennedy, in dissent, pointed out that the Edwards–Roberson rule will prevent the police from interrogating suspects based on newly discovered evidence or offenses (Arizona v. Roberson, 486 U.S. 675 [1988]).

Some of the difficulties with the initiation test are illustrated by United States v. Green. In Green, a defendant was arrested on a drug charge, was read his Miranda rights, invoked his right to an attorney, and pled guilty. Three months later, the police obtained an arrest warrant charging the defendant with an unrelated homicide that had taken place six months before he had been arrested on the drug charge. The defendant subsequently was interrogated on the homicide and, after being advised of his Miranda rights, confessed. Despite the fact that five months had passed between the time that the defendant invoked his right to counsel and the time that he confessed to the murder, the District of Columbia Court of Appeals ruled that a strict interpretation of the Edwards rule dictated that the confession should be suppressed (United States v. Green, 592 A.2d 985 [D.C. App. 1991]). The U.S. Supreme Court was in the process of considering this case when the defendant died, and as a result, no ruling was issued. How would you resolve the dilemma confronting the judge in Green?

The next issue confronting the U.S. Supreme Court was clarifying what the Court meant in Edwards when it wrote that a suspect is not subject to interrogation until a lawyer has been “made available to him.” In Minnick v. Mississippi, Mississippi argued that once a defendant requests and meets with an attorney, “counsel has been made available to him.” Following this meeting, Mississippi argued that the police are free to interrogate a suspect without a lawyer being present. The Supreme Court, however, held that a “fair reading of Edwards . . . demonstrates that we have interpreted the rule to bar police-initiated interrogation unless the accused has counsel with him at the time of questioning . . . When counsel is requested, interrogation must cease, and officials may not reinstate interrogation without counsel present, whether or not the accused has consulted with his attorney” (Minnick v. Mississippi, 498 U.S. 146, 150 [1990]).

In summary, keep three points in mind when it comes to a suspect’s invocation of the Miranda rights and waiver of the Miranda rights.

- Invocation of counsel. We saw in Davis that the invocation of a right to counsel and presumably the right to silence requires a clear and unambiguous statement.
- Scrupulously honored. Mosley taught us that the waiver of the right to silence following the assertion of this right is considered voluntary in those instances in which the police scrupulously honored the suspect’s rights.
- Initiation. A waiver of the invocation of the right to an attorney following the assertion of this right is considered voluntary in those instances in which the defendant initiates contact with the police.

What do we mean by initiation? Must there be a clear and affirmative statement of waiver? The U.S. Supreme Court provided an answer to this question in Oregon v. Bradshaw, the next case on the study site. In reading Bradshaw, pay attention to the legal test for waiver of the right to a lawyer. The Supreme Court ruled that Bradshaw’s question to a police officer, “Well, what is going to happen to me now?” constituted initiation and a waiver of Bradshaw’s previous request for a lawyer. The Court reasoned that “[a]lthough ambiguous, the respondent’s question in this case as to what was going to happen to him evinced a willingness and a desire for a generalized discussion about the investigation; it was not merely a necessary inquiry arising out of the incidents of the custodial relationship.” Did Bradshaw intend to waive his right to an attorney? Ask yourself whether the law has made it difficult or easy for the police to obtain a waiver from an individual who has previously invoked his or her right to an attorney.
Defendant Wayne Montgomery was convicted of possession of a sawed-off shotgun and three firearms. Montgomery asserted his right to an attorney. The federal agents then proceeded to photograph and fingerprint Montgomery. The following conversation then occurred.

Montgomery: Am I being charged with each gun?
Agent Sherman: You will probably be charged with two counts.
Montgomery: Did all of the guns fire?
Agent Sherman: Yes. Why do you want to know?
Montgomery: The sawed-off was in pieces [in a duffel bag].
Agent Sherman: That is right, but it only took a minute to put together.

Montgomery: Ya, but it was missing a spring.
Agent Sherman: Well, the State Police fired the gun and it worked. Did you have any problem firing the gun?
Montgomery: I could not get it to work.

Montgomery then indicated that he did not want to talk any more about the firearms, and the conversation ended.

His attorney unsuccessfully sought to suppress this statement, and it was introduced into evidence at trial as evidence that the defendant knowingly possessed the firearms. Did Montgomery initiate the conversation with Agent Sherman and waive his right to an attorney?

8.8 YOU DECIDE

Criminal Procedure in the News

In 2006, the United Nations Committee Against Torture called for an impartial national investigation of alleged “police brutality and torture in Chicago, about which nothing has been done for a long time.” The report was issued by ten independent international experts charged with monitoring compliance with the international Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (1984).

This echoed a 1990 report by the international human rights organization Amnesty International that called for an investigation into ongoing allegations of torture of individuals subjected to police interrogation in Chicago.

It is alleged that between 1973 and 1991, at least sixty-six individuals were tortured by Chicago Police Commander Jon Burge and by the officers under his supervision in the Area 2 police headquarters in Chicago. Burge and his fellow officers are accused of beating suspects, shocking them with electric wires and cattle prods, suffocating them using plastic bags, and jamming guns against their heads or in their mouths in order to extract confessions. The credibility of this charge is bolstered by a report by the Chicago Police Department’s Office of Professional Standards (OPS), which, in 1990, listed the names of fifty alleged victims of police torture. The report determined that physical abuse “did occur and… it was systematic…. [T]he type of abuse… was not limited to the usual beatings, but went into such areas as psychological techniques and planned torture.” The OPS investigation also concluded that members of the police command were aware of the “systematic abuse” and either participated in the activity or failed to intervene to bring it to an end.

The case that first brought these charges to public attention involved Andrew Wilson, convicted of killing two police officers. Wilson ultimately won a civil judgment against the City of Chicago, which admitted that Wilson had been tortured and that Burge and others had acted in an “outrageous manner and utilized methods far beyond those… permitted and expected by the Police Department.” Lawyers for the City also conceded that Burge and others had tortured another suspect nine days earlier. This led to Burge’s termination in 1993 and to the suspension of two detectives. It later was revealed that Chicago had spent more than six million dollars in legal fees defending Burge and the police under his command against charges of torture.

There is no question that most of the individuals who were apparently tortured by Burge and his men, in fact, were guilty. Some innocent individuals, however, were convicted. In January 2003, Illinois Governor George Ryan granted four death row inmates pardons after concluding that their confessions had been obtained by Burge and his unit through torture.

The claims of torture have received support from a number of state and federal courts. In 1999, Federal District Court Judge Milton Shadur wrote that it is “now common knowledge that… Jon Burge and… officers working under him regularly engaged in the physical abuse and torture of prisoners to extract confessions… beatings and other means of torture occurred as an established practice, not just on an isolated basis”
You should have it firmly fixed in your mind that a defendant may not be interrogated by the police prior to the reading of the Miranda warnings. Following the reading of the Miranda rights, there also are firm limits on police interrogation. As we have seen, once a suspect invokes either the right to silence or the right to an attorney, he or she is not subject to interrogation. The police must scrupulously honor the right to silence and may interrogate a suspect only about a crime different in time, nature, and place after suspending interrogation for a period of time and issuing a fresh set of Miranda warnings. A suspect who invokes his or her right to an attorney may be interrogated only in the event that the suspect initiates contact with the police.

What is the definition of police interrogation? Does this mean that the police are prohibited from conversing with the suspect? Can the police let a suspect know that they found several hundred pounds of cocaine in his or her house or inform the suspect of the progress of the investigation or of the fact that a co-conspirator confessed?

In Rhode Island v. Innis, the U.S. Supreme Court defined interrogation. The Court explained that interrogation involves either express questioning or the functional equivalent of express questioning.

- Express questioning. Questions directed to a suspect by the police.
- Functional equivalent. Words or actions on the part of the police (other than those normally attendant to arrest and custody) that the police should know are reasonably likely to elicit an incriminating response from the suspect.

Express questioning entails a direct question. The test for the functional equivalent of questioning is whether the police should know that a practice is likely to elicit an incriminating statement from a suspect. The police are required to put themselves in the shoes of the suspect and ask themselves whether a statement or practice is likely to lead the suspect to incriminate himself or herself. For example, the police should anticipate that an appeal to religion may lead a suspect who is a member of the clergy to incriminate himself or herself.

In reading Rhode Island v. Innis, ask yourself whether the legal test for interrogation is clearly stated by the Court. Do you believe that the police unconstitutionally interrogated Innis?
Facts

On the night of January 12, 1975, John Mulvaney, a Providence, RI, taxicab driver, disappeared after being dispatched to pick up a customer. His body was discovered four days later buried in a shallow grave in Coventry, RI. He had died from a shotgun blast aimed at the back of his head.

On January 17, 1975, shortly after midnight, the Providence police received a telephone call from Gerald Aubin, also a taxicab driver, who reported that he had just been robbed by a man wielding a sawed-off shotgun. Aubin further reported that he had dropped off his assailant near Rhode Island College in a section of Providence known as Mount Pleasant. While at the Providence police station waiting to give a statement, Aubin noticed a picture of his assailant on a bulletin board. Aubin so informed one of the police officers present. The officer prepared a photo array, and again Aubin identified a picture of the same person. That person was the respondent. Shortly thereafter, the Providence police began a search of the Mount Pleasant area.

At approximately 4:30 a.m. on the same date, Patrolman Lovell, while cruising the streets of Mount Pleasant in a patrol car, spotted the respondent standing in the street facing him. When Patrolman Lovell stopped his car, the respondent walked towards it. Patrolman Lovell then arrested the respondent, who was unarmed, and advised him of his so-called Miranda rights. While the two men waited in the patrol car for other police officers to arrive, Patrolman Lovell did not converse with the respondent other than to respond to the latter’s request for a cigarette.

Within minutes, Sergeant Sears arrived at the scene of the arrest, and he also gave the respondent the Miranda warnings. Immediately thereafter, Captain Leyden and other police officers arrived. Captain Leyden advised the respondent of his Miranda rights. The respondent stated that he understood those rights and wanted to speak with a lawyer. Captain Leyden then directed that the respondent be placed in a “caged wagon,” a four-door police car with a wire screen mesh between the front and rear seats, and be driven to the central police station. Three officers, Patrolmen Gleckman, Williams, and McKenna, were assigned to accompany the respondent to the central station. They placed the respondent in the vehicle and shut the doors. Captain Leyden then instructed the officers not to question the respondent or intimidate or coerce him in any way. The three officers then entered the vehicle, and it departed.

While en route to the central station, Patrolman Gleckman initiated a conversation with Patrolman McKenna concerning the missing shotgun. As Patrolman Gleckman later testified:

> At this point, I was talking back and forth with Patrolman McKenna stating that I frequent this area while on patrol and [that because a school for handicapped children is located nearby] there’s a lot of handicapped children running around in this area, and God forbid one of them might find a weapon with shells and they might hurt themselves.

Patrolman McKenna apparently shared his fellow officer’s concern:

> I more or less concurred with him [Gleckman] that it was a safety factor and that we should, you know, continue to search for the weapon and try to find it.

While Patrolman Williams said nothing, he overheard the conversation between the two officers:

> He [Gleckman] said it would be too bad if the little—I believe he said a girl—would pick up the gun, maybe kill herself.

The respondent then interrupted the conversation, stating that the officers should turn the car around so he could show them where the gun was located. At this point, Patrolman McKenna radioed back to Captain Leyden that they were returning to the scene of the arrest, and that the respondent would inform them of the location of the gun. At the time the respondent indicated that the officers should turn back, they had traveled no more than a mile, a trip encompassing only a few minutes.

The police vehicle then returned to the scene of the arrest where a search for the shotgun was in progress. There, Captain Leyden again advised the respondent of his Miranda rights. The respondent replied that he understood those rights but that he “wanted to get the gun out of the way because of the kids in the area in the school.” The respondent then led the police to a nearby field, where he pointed out the shotgun under some rocks by the side of the road.

The trial court sustained the admissibility of the shotgun and testimony related to its discovery. That evidence was later introduced at the respondent’s trial, and the jury returned a verdict of guilty on all counts.

Issue

In Miranda v. Arizona, the Court held that once a defendant in custody asks to speak with a lawyer, all interrogation must cease until a lawyer is present. The issue, therefore, is whether the respondent was “interrogated” by the police officers in violation of the respondent’s undisputed right under Miranda to remain silent until he had consulted with a lawyer. In resolving this issue, we first define the term interrogation under Miranda before turning to a consideration of the facts of this case.

Reasoning

The starting point for defining interrogation in this context is, of course, the Court’s Miranda opinion. There, the Court observed that “[b]y custodial interrogation, we mean questioning initiated by law enforcement officers after a person has been taken into custody or otherwise deprived of his freedom of action in any significant way.” This passage and other references throughout the opinion to “questioning” might suggest that the Miranda rules were to apply only to those police interrogation practices that involve express questioning of a defendant while in custody. We do not, however, construe the Miranda opinion so narrowly. The concern of the Court in Miranda was that the “interrogation environment” created by the interplay of interrogation and custody would “subjugate the individual to the will of his examiner” and thereby undermine the privilege against compulsory self-incrimination. The police practices that evoked this concern included several that did not involve express questioning. For example, one of the practices discussed in Miranda was the use of lineups in which a coached witness would pick the defendant as the perpetrator. This was designed to establish that the defendant was in fact guilty as a predicate for further interrogation. A variation on this theme discussed in Miranda was the so-called “reverse lineup” in which a defendant would be identified by coached witnesses as the perpetrator of a fictitious crime, with the object of inducing him to confess to the actual crime of which he was suspected in order to escape the false prosecution. The Court in Miranda also included in its survey of interrogation practices the use of psychological ploys, such as to “[p]osit the guilt of the subject,” to “minimize the moral seriousness of the offense,” and “to cast blame on the victim or on society.” It is clear that these techniques of persuasion, no less than express questioning, were thought, in a custodial setting, to amount to interrogation.

We conclude that the Miranda safeguards come into play whenever a person in custody is subjected to either express questioning or its functional equivalent. That is to say, the term interrogation under Miranda refers not only to express questioning but also to any words or actions on the part of the police (other than those normally attendant to arrest and custody) that the police should know are reasonably likely to elicit an incriminating response from the suspect. The latter portion of this definition focuses primarily upon the perceptions of the suspect, rather than the intent of the police. This focus reflects the fact that the Miranda safeguards were designed to vest a suspect in custody with an added measure of protection against coercive police practices, without regard to objective proof of the underlying intent of the police. A practice that the police should know is reasonably likely to elicit an incriminating response from a suspect thus amounts to interrogation. But, since the police surely cannot be held accountable for the unforeseeable results of their words or actions, the definition of interrogation can extend only to words or actions on the part of police officers that they should have known were reasonably likely to elicit an incriminating response. By “incriminating response,” we refer to any response—whether inculpatory or exculpatory—that the prosecution may seek to introduce at trial. As the Court observed in Miranda:

This is not to say that the intent of the police is irrelevant, for it may well have a bearing on whether the police should have known that their words or actions were reasonably likely to elicit an incriminating response. In particular, where a police practice is designed to elicit an incriminating response from the accused, it is unlikely that the practice will not also be one which the police should have known was reasonably likely to have that effect.

Any knowledge the police may have had concerning the unusual susceptibility of a defendant to a particular form of persuasion might be an important factor in determining whether the police should have known that their words or actions were reasonably likely to elicit an incriminating response from the suspect.

Turning to the facts of the present case, we conclude that the respondent was not “interrogated” within the meaning of Miranda. It is undisputed that the first prong of the definition of interrogation was not satisfied, for the conversation between Patrolmen Gleckman and McKenna included no express questioning of the respondent. Rather, that conversation was, at least in form, nothing more than a dialogue between the two officers to which no response from the respondent was invited.

Moreover, it cannot be fairly concluded that the respondent was subjected to the “functional equivalent” of questioning. It cannot be said, in short, that Patrolmen Gleckman and McKenna should have known that their conversation was reasonably likely to elicit an incriminating response from the respondent. There is nothing in the record to suggest that the officers were aware that the respondent was peculiarly susceptible to an appeal to his conscience concerning the safety of handicapped children. Nor is there anything in the record to suggest that the police knew that the respondent was unusually disoriented or upset at the time of his arrest.
Holding

The case thus boils down to whether, in the context of a brief conversation, the officers should have known that the respondent would suddenly be moved to make a self-incriminating response. Given the fact that the entire conversation appears to have consisted of no more than a few offhand remarks, we cannot say that the officers should have known that it was reasonably likely that Innis would so respond. This is not a case where the police carried on a lengthy harangue in the presence of the suspect. Nor does the record support the respondent’s contention that under the circumstances, the officers’ comments were particularly “evocative.” It is our view, therefore, that the respondent was not subjected by the police to words or actions that the police should have known were reasonably likely to elicit an incriminating response from him.

By way of example, if the police had done no more than to drive past the site of the concealed weapon while taking the most direct route to the police station, and if the respondent, upon noticing for the first time the proximity of the school for handicapped children, had blurted out that he would show the officers where the gun was located, it could not seriously be argued that this “subtle compulsion” would have constituted “interrogation” within the meaning of the Miranda opinion.

Dissenting, Marshall, J., joined by Brennan, J.

One can scarcely imagine a stronger appeal to the conscience of a suspect—any suspect—than the assertion that if the weapon is not found, an innocent person will be hurt or killed. And not just any innocent person, but an innocent child—a little girl—a helpless, handicapped little girl on her way to school. The notion that such an appeal could not be expected to have any effect unless the suspect were known to have some special interest in handicapped children verges on the ludicrous. As a matter of fact, the appeal to a suspect to confess for the sake of others, to “display some evidence of decency and honor,” is a classic interrogation technique.

Gleckman’s remarks would obviously have constituted interrogation if they had been explicitly directed to respondent, and the result should not be different because they were nominally addressed to McKenna. This is not a case where police officers speaking among themselves are accidentally overheard by a suspect. These officers were “talking back and forth” in close quarters with the handcuffed suspect, traveling past the very place where they believed the weapon was located. They knew respondent would hear and attend to their conversation, and they are chargeable with knowledge and responsibility for the pressures to speak which they created…

Dissenting, White, J.

As this example illustrates, the Court’s test creates an incentive for police to ignore a suspect’s invocation of his rights in order to make continued attempts to extract information from him. If a suspect does not appear to be susceptible to a particular type of psychological pressure, the police are apparently free to exert that pressure on him despite his request for counsel, so long as they are careful not to punctuate their statements with question marks. And if, contrary to all reasonable expectations, the suspect makes an incriminating statement, that statement can be used against him at trial. The Court thus turns Miranda’s unequivocal rule against any interrogation at all into a trap in which unwary suspects may be caught by police deception.

The Court’s assumption that criminal suspects are not susceptible to appeals to conscience is directly contrary to the teachings of police interrogation manuals, which recommend appealing to a suspect’s sense of morality as a standard and often successful interrogation technique. Surely, the practical experience embodied in such manuals should not be ignored in a case such as this in which the record is devoid of any evidence—one way or the other—as to the susceptibility of suspects in general or of Innis in particular.

Questions for Discussion

1. Why did Innis confess? Out of guilt or self-interest? Should the police have been aware that the discussion concerning handicapped children might elicit an incriminating response?

2. Was the shotgun important to the prosecution’s case against Innis? Would the police likely have been successful in obtaining a confession once Innis met with a lawyer?

3. Can you give an example of actions that are likely to lead a suspect to self-incriminate? What about showing a suspect photos of a bloody crime scene?

4. The definition of interrogation in Innis must be applied to the facts in each case. As a police officer, would you be clear after reading Innis about what you can and cannot say to a suspect?

5. How would you rule in this case?

6. Problems in policing. Explain how the police can rely on the rule in Innis to elicit a confession from a suspect who has invoked his or her Miranda rights.
Taped Interrogations. Questions about what transpired during police interrogation often come down to a “swearing contest” at trial between the police and the defendant. The officer testifies that he or she respected the defendant’s rights, and the defendant alleges that the confession was coerced or was the product of police manipulation and trickery.

Many legal scholars advocate the taping of interrogations to provide a record of what transpired in the interrogation room and to guard against psychologically and physically coercive interrogations. Various states, by statute or court decision, require taping of at least some serious felony cases. This has been required by the supreme courts of Alaska, Minnesota, and New Jersey and for certain offenses by the state legislatures of Illinois, Maine, New Mexico, Texas, and Wisconsin and by the District of Columbia. In 2004, the American Bar Association also endorsed the audio or video recording of interrogations. Australia, Canada, and England provide for the taping of confessions. At last count, 450 local police departments also require the videotaping of interrogations.

In 2004, in Commonwealth v. DiGiambattista, the Massachusetts Supreme Court ruled that “when there is not at least an audiotape recording of the complete interrogation, the defendant is entitled (on request) to a jury instruction advising that the State’s highest court has expressed a preference that such interrogations be recorded whenever practicable, and cautioning the jury that because of the absence of any recording of the interrogation in the case before them, they should weigh evidence of the defendant’s alleged statement with great caution and care.”

Valero DiGiambattista was convicted of burning the home that he vacated following a dispute with his landlord. The police obtained a confession by suggesting that DiGiambattista had been caught on videotape and had been seen by a witness at the crime scene while minimizing the seriousness of the burning of the unoccupied dwelling and suggesting that DiGiambattista needed counseling to cure his alcoholism. The police seemingly disregarded the fact that DiGiambattista’s description of how he set the fire by pouring gasoline throughout the house was at odds with the forensic evidence gathered at the crime scene. In addition, the stores where he claimed to have purchased the gasoline can and gasoline had no record of such purchases. At the urging of the police officers, DiGiambattista wrote a letter of apology to the landlord that repeated the information in the confession and explained that he had been stressed and drunk and that he was grateful that no one was injured. The Massachusetts Supreme Court ruled that DiGiambattista’s confession was involuntary based on the police officers’ reliance on trickery combined with minimization of the seriousness of the defendant’s offense and references to counseling, which the court believed indicated that the suspect would receive a relatively light sentence.

The Massachusetts Supreme Court’s opinion also included a number of observations concerning the desirability of recording interrogations. The court noted that the failure of the police to record DiGiambattista’s interrogation meant that the court was forced to spend a significant amount of time reconstructing what had occurred several years ago. The court also observed that prosecutors should favor taping because it makes it easier for the government to demonstrate beyond a reasonable doubt that a suspect’s confession was voluntary. A court, for example, might conclude after viewing DiGiambattista’s interrogation that despite the tactics employed by the police, his confession was voluntary. Videotaping also would deter coercive police practices and inspire confidence in the police. The Massachusetts Supreme Court therefore held that based on these policy reasons, the jury in criminal prosecutions should be instructed that they are to weigh confessions that are not recorded with “great caution and care.” The court explained that it was only fair to inform the jury that the party with the burden of proof has decided not to preserve “evidence of that interrogation in a more reliable form, and to tell them that they may consider that fact as part of their assessment.”

The main objection to recording is that it will discourage suspects from making statements to the police because they may be reluctant to provide a permanent record of their admissions of guilt that may be used in a court of law. Other critics point to the financial cost of taping. Another criticism is that the police can conceal abuse by coercing suspects and then turning on the videotape and interrogating suspects in a calm and controlled fashion. What is your view? Should there be a requirement that interrogations be videotaped? You might be interested to know that the FBI generally does not tape confessions. What about only audiotaping confessions? Charles Sawyer was arrested for aggravated sexual battery at his home, and the officers informed him that they were taking him to the jail to “discuss what was going on.” At the jail, Sawyer was taken to the office of Detective Clark. Clark was seated behind a desk and read Sawyer the arrest warrant and the affidavit of the complaint that detailed that Sawyer had rubbed the leg and vaginal area of a twelve-year-old girl. Sawyer then admitted rubbing the girl’s leg while denying the other allegation. He then was read his Miranda rights. Was Detective Clark’s statement the functional
Sixth Amendment Right
to Counsel: Police Interrogations

The Sixth Amendment provides for the right to a speedy and public trial before an impartial jury with the right to obtain witnesses and to confront your accusers. The Amendment further guarantees that an individual shall “have the assistance of counsel for his defense.” The right to an attorney is crucial; without the skill and expertise of a lawyer, an individual may find himself or herself unable to meaningfully contest his or her guilt at trial. The U.S. Supreme Court, in a series of cases, extended the Sixth Amendment right to counsel beyond the criminal trial to provide protections to individuals subjected to interrogation in the postindictment phases of the criminal justice process. Keep two points in mind as we explore the Sixth Amendment right to counsel.

The Sixth Amendment right supplements the due process voluntariness and Fifth Amendment Miranda protections. The Sixth Amendment automatically attaches following the initiation of criminal proceedings. At this point, guilt or innocence is to be determined in a court of law.

The Sixth Amendment protection insures that the criminal justice process functions in a fair fashion. In contrast, the due process voluntariness test protects individuals against involuntary confessions, and Miranda is intended to safeguard the right against self-incrimination.

In 1964, in Massiah v. United States, as we have seen, the U.S. Supreme Court proclaimed that following indictment, individuals enjoy a Sixth Amendment right to counsel that provides protection against the police deliberately eliciting incriminating statements (Massiah v. United States, 377 U.S. 201, 206 [1964]). As you recall, the Sixth Amendment right to counsel also provided the basis for the Court’s decision two years later in Escobedo v. Illinois. These two decisions were thereafter overshadowed by the Supreme Court’s decision in Miranda v. Arizona recognizing that the Fifth Amendment provides protections for individuals subjected to custodial interrogation. The Sixth Amendment was not again employed to protect individuals from interrogation until 1977 when the Supreme Court applied the Sixth Amendment in Brewer v. Williams (430 U.S. 387 [1977]). Brewer was followed by a number of decisions that further defined the Sixth Amendment right to counsel.

As noted above, the Sixth Amendment provides protections to individuals confronting formal criminal proceedings.

In 2008, in Rothergy v. Gillepsie County, the U.S. Supreme Court clarified that the Sixth Amendment right attaches at a criminal defendant’s “initial appearance before a judicial officer,” where he or she learns the charge against him, a probable cause determination is made, and bail is set restricting the defendant’s liberty (Rothergy v. Gillespie County, 554 U.S. ___ [2008]). At this point, an individual’s status has shifted from that of a criminal suspect to that of a criminally accused. As the Supreme Court observed in Moran v. Burbine, the Sixth Amendment’s “intended function is not to wrap a protective cloak around the attorney-client relationship for its own sake…. [By] its very terms, [the Sixth Amendment] becomes applicable only when the government’s role shifts from investigation to accusation…. [I]t is only then that the assistance of one versed in the intricacies of law is needed to assure the prosecution’s case encounters the ‘crucible of meaningful adversarial testing’” (Moran v. Burbine, 475 U.S. 412, 430 [1986]).

The philosophy underlying the Sixth Amendment protection from involuntary interrogation is that individuals against whom criminal proceedings have been initiated are entitled to have their guilt or innocence determined in a court of law before a judge and jury and that this process should not be short-circuited by permitting the police to elicit incriminating information from an individual in the absence of his or her lawyer.

Massiah provided the foundation for the development of the Sixth Amendment right to counsel. As you may recall, Massiah was indicted for federal narcotics violations, retained a lawyer, pled guilty, and was released on bail. Massiah’s co-defendant, Colson, agreed to cooperate with the government and engaged Massiah in a conversation in Colson’s car, which was equipped with a radio transmitter. A government agent overheard Massiah make several incriminating remarks. The Supreme Court ruled that although Massiah had made a voluntary admission, his statement was obtained in violation of Massiah’s Sixth Amendment right to counsel. Justice Stewart explained that at a time when Massiah was entitled to have his guilt adjudicated in a courtroom presided over by a judge, Massiah had been subjected to police orchestrated extrajudicial interrogation in the absence of counsel. This denied Massiah a range of rights, including the opportunity to cross-examine the witnesses against him. In summary, Massiah had been denied his right to counsel “where there was used against him at his trial evidence of his own incriminating words, which federal agents had deliberately elicited from him after he had been indicted and in the absence of counsel” (Massiah v. United States, 377 U.S. 201, 204 [1964]).

The Supreme Court did not return to the Sixth Amendment protection against the deliberate eliciting of a confession until Brewer v. Williams in 1977. Williams had been arraigned for the murder of a ten-year-old child and was being transported to Des Moines, Iowa. The deeply religious, former mental patient confessed after one of the officers gave an emotional speech on the importance of providing the young woman with a “Christian burial.” The Supreme Court concluded that Detective Leaming “deliberately and designedly set out to elicit information from Williams just as surely as and perhaps more effectively than if he had formally interrogated him.” Detective Leaming was fully aware that Williams was represented by an attorney, and the Supreme Court stressed that in such circumstances, a heavy burden rests on the government to establish that Williams intentionally relinquished or abandoned his Sixth Amendment right to counsel. The Supreme Court concluded that Williams’s Sixth Amendment rights had been violated and held that his confession had been improperly admitted into evidence. Brewer is important for extending the Sixth Amendment and Fourteenth Amendment right to a lawyer by holding that a person is “entitled to the help of a lawyer at or after the time that judicial proceedings have been initiated against him—‘whether by way of formal charge, preliminary hearing, indictment, information or arraignment’” (Brewer, 430 U.S. at 398).

Would Brewer have been decided differently if Detective Leaming had asked Williams whether he wanted to waive his right to an attorney and to discuss the charges against him? In 2009, in Montejo v. Louisiana, the Supreme Court reversed a decision in Michigan v. Jackson (475 U.S. 625 [1986]) and held that the police are free to initiate contact with a defendant following a preliminary hearing in which the Sixth Amendment right to counsel has attached and that the defendant should be given the opportunity by the police to waive legal representation. It previously was assumed that any statements made by a defendant in response to police-initiated questioning following the attachment of a suspect’s Sixth Amendment right to counsel were involuntary. Justice Scalia explained that in roughly twenty-four states including Louisiana, lawyers are appointed for defendants without requiring the defendants to request legal representation at a hearing and that defendants like Montejo may welcome the opportunity to cooperate with the police. Montejo clearly was aware of the consequences of talking to the police without his lawyer being present because he had been read his Miranda rights after being approached by the police following the hearing, had agreed to talk to law enforcement officials, and subsequently wrote a letter of apology to the victim’s widow (Montejo v. Louisiana, 556 U.S. ___ [2009]).

The main importance of the Sixth Amendment is in providing defendants protection against interrogation by government informants. In 1980, in United States v. Henry, the Supreme Court held that the Sixth Amendment provided protections to prison inmates facing trial against unknowing interrogations by undercover government agents. The Court held that the government had contravened Henry's Sixth Amendment right when the FBI instructed Nichols, a paid government informant, to gather information on Henry's involvement in a bank robbery. Nichols was directed to engage Henry in discussions but not to directly question Henry about the crime. The Supreme Court nevertheless concluded that the informant was not a passive listener. He had engaged Henry in conversation and succeeded in eliciting a confession. Justice Burger noted that even if the government officials did not intend for the informant to take active steps to obtain a confession, the government must have anticipated that it had created a situation that was likely to “induce Henry to make incriminating statements without the assistance of counsel.” Consider how the decision in Henry differs from the U.S. Supreme Court decision in the Miranda case of Illinois v. Perkins (United States v. Henry, 447 U.S. 264, 272–273 [1980]).

Six years later, in Kuhlmann v. Wilson, the Supreme Court seemingly reversed course and ruled that the government did not violate Wilson’s Sixth Amendment rights. An informant was instructed not to ask questions concerning Wilson’s pending murder and robbery prosecution and was advised to “keep his ears open” and to pay attention to any unsolicited admissions of guilt. The informant reportedly listened to Wilson’s spontaneous statements of guilt and testified against Wilson at trial. The Supreme Court stressed that the Sixth Amendment is not violated when the government through “luck or happenstance” obtains incriminating statements from the accused after the right to counsel has attached. The defendant must demonstrate that the police and the informant did not merely listen but took some action that was “designed deliberately to elicit incriminating remarks” (Kuhlmann v. Wilson, 477 U.S. 436, 459 [1986]).

In summary, the Sixth Amendment right to counsel applies under certain conditions:

- Judicial proceedings. The Sixth Amendment applies to both federal and state government agents at or after the time that judicial proceedings have been initiated against an accused—whether by way of formal charge, preliminary hearing, indictment, information, or arraignment.

- Deliberately elicited. The government may not intentionally elicit information. This prohibits the use of informants to directly interrogate suspects as well as the creation of a situation likely to induce a defendant to make incriminating statements concerning a pending charge without the assistance of counsel.

- Waiver. The police may initiate contact with an individual whose Sixth Amendment right to counsel has attached following a preliminary hearing, and the individual is free to talk to the police. The suspect must voluntarily, knowingly, and intelligently relinquish his or her right to counsel prior to his or her interrogation.

Keep in mind that the Supreme Court held in McNeil v. Wisconsin that the Sixth Amendment is “offense specific.” In McNeil, McNeil was considered to have automatically asserted his Sixth Amendment right to counsel when he appeared at a bail hearing for armed robbery. The U.S. Supreme Court ruled that this did not prohibit the deputy sheriff from later reading McNeil the Miranda rights and obtaining a confession about a factually unrelated murder, attempted murder, and armed burglary. Justice Scalia explained that the Sixth Amendment applies only to the specific offense that is the subject of criminal proceedings and that McNeil was required to affirmatively assert his desire to consult with an attorney under Miranda when questioned about the homicides (McNeil v. Wisconsin, 501 U.S. 171 [1991]). Note that at the time that McNeil was decided, the police would have been prohibited by the Sixth Amendment from questioning McNeil on the same offense that was the subject of the bail hearing (as you may recall, this rule was changed in 2009 in Montejo v. Louisiana). Another point to keep in mind is that the Sixth Amendment applies only to the specific offense for which you have been prosecuted. An indictment for murder does not protect you against being interrogated for a robbery that occurred during the murder (Texas v. Cobb, 532 U.S. 162 [2000]).

You likely are fairly confused at this point. The important point is that once proceedings have been initiated against a suspect and the suspect has requested or retained a lawyer, the police are prohibited from interrogating the suspect outside the presence of a lawyer. This is intended to insure that innocence or guilt is established at trial rather than through police questioning. Now that you understand the Sixth Amendment right to counsel, you might ask yourself why we need this protection. Why is Miranda not sufficient?

Legal Equation

Sixth Amendment right to counsel at interrogation

The Sixth Amendment applies at the time that judicial proceedings have been initiated against an accused—whether by way of formal charge, preliminary hearing, indictment, information, or arraignment

+

The accused must have requested or arranged for legal representation

+

The government may not deliberately elicit information absent a waiver

The suspect must voluntarily, knowingly, and intelligently relinquish his or her right to an attorney.

Chapter Summary

Confessions are essential in the investigation and detection of crime. The procedural standards governing confessions are based on the following:

- Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.
- Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination.
- Sixth Amendment right to counsel.
Together, these constitutional amendments have been interpreted to insure that confessions are the product of fair procedures:

- Voluntary. Are the product of voluntary choice and are not the result of psychologically or physically coercive interrogation tactics.
- Procedures. Result from fair and uniform procedures.
- Reliable. May be relied on as a truthful account of the facts.
- Trials. Do not result in a defendant’s guilt or innocence being determined by extrajudicial, police-orchestrated questioning rather than in an adversarial trial.

The three constitutional approaches to confessions are summarized below:

Due process. The due process voluntariness test was first articulated in Brown v. Mississippi in 1936. This requires that a confession be the result of a free and voluntary choice and not be the product of compulsion. Courts decide whether a confession is voluntary by analyzing the totality of the circumstances. This test is criticized for failing to provide law enforcement officials with clear standards to guide their decisions and is difficult for courts to apply. The Supreme Court attempted to provide greater clarity in McNabb v. United States (1943) and in Mallory v. United States (1957), which require the police to immediately bring suspects before a judicial officer for arraignment. Any confession obtained by unnecessarily delaying the presentation of a suspect before a judge is inadmissible. These rulings were limited by congressional legislation and proved to have limited impact on state criminal procedure.

In 1964, in Escobedo v. Illinois, the Supreme Court took an additional step to clarify the protections to be extended to suspects when the Court held that Escobedo was entitled to be informed of his rights to silence and counsel under the Sixth Amendment and that Escobedo’s statement had been unconstitutionally obtained and improperly introduced into evidence.

Miranda. The Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination was extended to the states in Malloy v. Hogan (1964). The Fifth Amendment provided the basis for Miranda v. Arizona (1966). Miranda established that individuals subjected to custodial interrogation are to be informed that anything they say may be used against them and that they have the right to silence and the right to an attorney, appointed or retained. The Miranda warning is intended to provide individuals with the necessary information to resist the inherent pressures of custodial interrogation. There are a number of central components of the Miranda rule.

Custodial interrogation. Miranda is triggered by custodial interrogation. This is the threshold determination and occurs when there is a custodial arrest or the functional equivalent of a custodial arrest. In determining whether there is the functional equivalent of custodial interrogation, judges ask whether a reasonable person, based on the totality of the circumstances, would believe that the individual is in police custody to a degree associated with a formal arrest. Courts typically ask whether a reasonable person would feel free to leave.

Public safety. In New York v. Quarles, the U.S. Supreme Court recognized a public safety exception to Miranda. This exception permits the police to ask questions reasonably prompted by a reasonable concern with public safety without first advising a suspect of his or her Miranda rights. The Supreme Court concluded that a reasonable concern with the safety of the police or the public outweighs the interest in protecting the suspect’s right against self-incrimination.

Miranda warning. The three-part Miranda warning is essential for informing suspects of their rights and of the consequences of waiving their rights. The Miranda judgment states that the warnings are to be recited in “clear and unequivocal terms” and that a suspect is to be “clearly informed” of his or her rights. The Supreme Court has provided broad guidance to the police on how to recite the Miranda rights. Miranda is a flexible formula. The test is whether the warnings viewed in their totality convey the essential information to the suspect.

Invocation of rights. Following the reading of the Miranda rights, a defendant has the opportunity to assert his or her right to a lawyer or right to silence or to waive these rights. In Davis v. United States (1994), the Supreme Court held that an individual is required to “articulate his desire to have counsel present...sufficiently clearly that a reasonable police officer in the circumstances would understand the statement to be a request for an attorney.” The Court reasoned that a rule that required the police to cease questioning following an ambiguous statement by the accused would transform Miranda into a “wholly irrational obstacle to interrogations.” A defendant also is required to invoke the right to silence in an unambiguous fashion.

Voluntary waiver. The Supreme Court stressed in Miranda that the government is required to meet a “heavy burden” in demonstrating that a suspect voluntarily, knowingly, and intelligently waived his or her rights. The Miranda decision noted that any evidence that an accused was threatened, tricked, or cajoled into a waiver is sufficient to demonstrate that a suspect did not voluntarily waive his or her rights. A waiver also will not be upheld if obtained under coercive circumstances such as a lengthy interrogation or a lengthy incarceration prior to a confession.

Knowing and intelligent waiver. We have seen that an individual must understand the Miranda rights as well as the consequences of waiving them. Tague v. Louisiana held that a police officer may not automatically conclude that an individual knowingly and intelligently waived his or her rights. What factors are relevant in determining whether a waiver of Miranda is knowing and intelligent? In Fare v. Michael C., the Supreme Court indicated that the question whether a waiver is knowing and intelligent is determined on a case-by-case basis by the totality of the circumstances. In Fare, this analysis considered the “juvenile’s age, experience, education, background, and intelligence and whether he [or she] has the capacity to understand the warnings given him [or her] . . . and the consequences of waiving those rights.” Courts also will examine whether the defendant acted in a calm and rational fashion or in an emotional and incoherent manner. The Supreme Court stressed that the Constitution does not require that an individual should be informed of all the information that might prove useful in arriving at a decision whether to waive his or her rights, such as the strength of the prosecution’s case.

Express and implied waiver. A waiver, as we have seen, must be voluntary, knowing, and intelligent. Miranda indicated that an “express statement that the individual is willing to make a statement and does not want an attorney followed closely by a statement could constitute a waiver.” A waiver will not be presumed from an accused’s silence. The Supreme Court has recognized implied as well as explicit waivers and ruled that “in some cases, a waiver can be clearly inferred from the actions and words of the person interrogated.” In these instances, the prosecution is required to establish that although there was no affirmative waiver, the suspect engaged in a “course of conduct indicating waiver.”

Question first and warn later. The U.S. Supreme Court was next asked to address whether a waiver is valid that is obtained through a question first and warn later tactic. In Missouri v. Seibert, the Supreme Court stated that the issue when the police question first and warn later is whether “it would be reasonable to find that in these circumstances the warnings could function ‘effectively’ to advise the suspect that he or she had a real choice about giving an admissible statement.” In other words, when a suspect is warned that “anything you say may be used against you,” will he or she understand that despite the initial confession, he or she need not speak to the police? The Supreme Court suggested in a footnote that this might require that the police inform a suspect that the first confession is inadmissible in evidence.

Interrogation following invocation of the Miranda rights. Once individuals invoke their Miranda rights, the Supreme Court has recognized that they still may be subjected to interrogations. The Court ruled that the admissibility of statements obtained after a person in custody had decided to remain silent depends on whether his or her right to silence had been scrupulously honored. The Court, in Edwards v. Arizona, established a separate initiation test for determining whether a defendant who invokes his or her right to an attorney may be once again interrogated. Initiation does not require a direct waiver of an individual’s right to a lawyer. In Oregon v. Bradshaw, the Supreme Court held that the initiation standard is satisfied by a generalized discussion regarding the criminal investigation.

Interrogation. In Rhode Island v. Innis, the Supreme Court defined interrogation. The Court explained that interrogation entails express questioning or the functional equivalent of direct questioning. The test for the functional equivalent of direct questioning is whether the police should know that their words or actions are likely to elicit an incriminating statement from a suspect.

Sixth Amendment. In 1966, in Massiah v. United States, the U.S. Supreme Court proclaimed that following the initiation of criminal proceedings, individuals enjoy a Sixth Amendment right to counsel that protects them from the government’s deliberately eliciting incriminating statements. The Sixth Amendment was not again applied to protect individuals from interrogation in the pretrial phase of the criminal justice process until 1977 when the Supreme Court applied the Sixth Amendment in Brewer v. Williams. Brewer was followed by a number of decisions that further defined the Sixth Amendment right to counsel.

As noted above, the Sixth Amendment provides protections to individuals confronting formal criminal proceedings. At this point, an individual’s status has shifted from that of a criminal suspect to a criminally accused. The philosophy underlying the Sixth Amendment protection is that an individual against whom criminal proceedings have been initiated is entitled to have his or her guilt or innocence determined in a court of law before a judge and jury and that this process should not be short-circuited by permitting the police to elicit incriminating information from a defendant in the absence of his or her attorney or a waiver of the defendant’s Sixth Amendment right.

In reviewing this chapter, be certain that you understand the three constitutional approaches to interrogations and the points in the criminal justice process in which each applies:
• Fourteenth Amendment due process voluntariness test prohibits involuntary confessions and applies at all stages of the criminal justice process. You always have this protection.

• Fifth Amendment Miranda rights provide protections during custodial interrogation. You only have this protection during custodial interrogation.

• Sixth Amendment right to counsel applies after the initiation of formal proceedings against an accused following a request or hiring of a lawyer. You have this protection once your status shifts from criminal suspect to criminal defendant.

In thinking about Chapter 8, consider how the U.S. Supreme Court has attempted to balance the rights of the defendant against the interests of society in interrogations. For example, the invocation of the right to an attorney insulates a suspect from police interrogation unless the suspect initiates contact with the police. However, invocation of the right to counsel under United States v. Davis requires an affirmative and clear statement by the accused. The invocation of the right to a lawyer provides a defendant with significant protection against police interrogation but is easily waived under Oregon v. Bradshaw by a statement that relates generally to the criminal justice process. An individual who invokes his or her right to silence may still be interrogated by the police about a crime different in time, nature, and place where the police scrupulously honor the suspect’s rights (Mosley v. Michigan). Of course, the definition of interrogation is limited to express questioning or its functional equivalent, opening the door to the type of “subtle compulsion” that the police employed in Rhode Island v. Innis.

In Chapter 9, we turn our attention to other investigative mechanisms available to the police: lineups and identifications.

Chapter Review Questions

2. What are some of the dangers of relying on confessions to obtain criminal convictions?
3. Can you identify some of the reasons that suspects make false confessions?
4. Write a one-page response to the following quote. Supreme Court Justice Felix Frankfurter famously remarked, in regard to the due process test, that it is “impossible . . . to . . . precisely . . . delimit the power of interrogation allowed to state law enforcement officers in obtaining confessions. No single litmus-paper test . . . has . . . evolved” (Columbine v. Connecticut, 367 U.S. 568, 601–602 [1961]).
5. What is the significance of the McNabb–Mallory rule?
6. Summarize the holding in Escobedo v. Illinois. How did this set the stage for the Supreme Court’s decision in Miranda v. Arizona?
7. Why was the right against self-incrimination included in the U.S. Constitution? Distinguish between testimonial and nontestimonial evidence.
8. What is the holding of the U.S. Supreme Court in Miranda v. Arizona? Explain how this decision is intended to counter the pressures inherent in incommunicado interrogation.
9. What is the test for custodial interrogation? Discuss the public safety exception.
10. How should the Miranda rights be read to a suspect?
11. Give an example of a statement that satisfies the legal test for invoking the right to a lawyer under Miranda. Provide an example of a statement that would not satisfy the standard for invoking the right to a lawyer under Miranda.
12. Distinguish between a voluntary and an involuntary waiver. What factors does a court consider in determining whether a waiver is knowing and intelligent? What is the difference between an express and an implied waiver?
13. Why is it important whether an individual is considered to be subject to custodial interrogation? List the factors that a court evaluates in determining whether a suspect is subjected to custodial interrogation.
14. What is the legal test for determining whether the police can interrogate a suspect who has invoked his or her right to silence? What is the legal test for determining whether the police can interrogate a suspect who has invoked his or her right to a lawyer?
15. What is the legal test determining whether an individual has initiated contact with the police?
16. Define interrogation as articulated by the U.S. Supreme Court. Distinguish between direct questioning and the functional equivalent of direct questioning. Why would it be helpful for the police to understand the concept of interrogation under Miranda?
17. How does the Sixth Amendment right to counsel protect individuals from interrogation by the police?

18. Does Miranda handcuff the ability of the police to rely on confessions, or does it favor the police?

19. Write a brief essay illustrating how the U.S. Supreme Court’s decisions on police interrogation have balanced the interests of the suspect and the interests of society.
